Rae favors free trade with Israel

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Ontario Premier Bob Rae has called on the federal government to sign a free trade agreement with Israel in 1994 and change its policy limiting military deals with the Jewish state.

Rae, who was leading an Ontario economic delegation on a trip to the Middle East, told the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce that he would do everything in his power to push through a free trade agreement with Israel this year.

"Although the Ontario government has not been a great friend of the cause of free trade between Canada and the United States, the case of free trade with Israel is very compelling," he said. "Canadian businesses are now at a significant disadvantage in trading with Israel because we are still paying tariffs and duties on our products, whereas American and European companies are not. We must have a trade agreement with Israel that is comparable to what Europe and the United States have. Otherwise, Canadian companies will continue competing with one hand tied behind their back," said the premier.

In an interview with The CJN, Rae noted that Canadian companies involved in construction trade with Israel must use American lumber since Canadian materials are subject to prohibitively high tariffs.

He said the situation would become even more difficult by Jan. 1, 1995, when further tariff reductions on American and European products become effective.

"We must push through a trade deal in 1994. We simply can't afford to delay it any longer," he said, adding that the desirability of a free trade agreement with Israel was one of the rare issues that has the support of both Ontario's NDP government and the province's Chamber of Commerce.

Until recently, the issue has not been high on Canada's priorities, since annual exports to Israel amount to less than $120 million annually. Rae maintains that the potential for bilateral trade is much greater.

Moreover, he said he believes that Israel could serve as a stepping stone for launching Canadian products and technologies throughout the Middle East.

"We are not talking only about selling Canadian products in Israel," he said. "We are looking at strategic partnerships between Canadian and Israeli companies that will enable them to market jointly-developed technologies anywhere in the world."

He cited as an example a recently-signed agreement between the Ontario-based Newbridge Networks Corporation and Tadiran of Israel.

Rae also told The CJN that it was time for the federal government to rethink its restrictive policy regarding military trade with Israel.

"Israel ought to be included in the list of countries that compete for contracts to supply defence equipment to Canadian peace-keeping forces."

Syria re-opens doors for country's Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Syria appears to be opening the door again to the departure of the country's remaining 1,200 Jews, but it is unclear how many have been granted exit permits in recent weeks.

Reports on the number of travel documents that have been issued vary: U.S. congressional sources indicated that between 100 to 200 travel permits were issued in one week in late December, while news reports in Israel said up to 850 Syrian Jews were expected to get the precious travel permits in a one-week period.

Other reports, quoting an anonymous Jewish merchant in Damascus, put the number at 300 to 400 exit visas granted in a 10-day span.

Judy Feld Carr, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's National Task Force on Syrian Jewry, said she has received information that in some cases, children in one family were denied the travel documents while other members of the same family were granted them.

When a family brings the matter to the attention of government officials, they are told to come back in two weeks to discuss it, Feld Carr told The CJN.

Feld Carr, who has been an advocate for Syrian Jewry for 23 years, said, "I am really praying that they are all going to come out," but that Syrian officials seem to be creating "problems" for some Jewish families before they are allowed to leave.

She said it was too early to speculate as to the number of Jews who have been allowed to leave.

A true figure will only become available when Western countries issue entry visas to Syrian Jews who hold the exit permits.

Syria's on-again, off-again travel policy has been linked to President Hafez Assad's bid to improve relations with the United States. The most recent developments come in the wake of assurances given by Assad to U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher in early December that Syria would grant exit visas to all remaining Jews by the end of 1993.

Assad is expected to meet with President Bill Clinton in Geneva later this month and Assad's move is seen as a goodwill gesture in advance of the summit.

Syria relaxed travel restrictions on the country's Jews last April, but after October, few exit permits were issued.

In that seven-month span, about 3,300 Jews left the country, most settling in Brooklyn where there is a 35,000-strong Syrian-Jewish emigre community.

Jewish groups in Canada and the United States have continued to lobby for full emigration for Syrian Jews. Feld Carr said the Canadian government has been at the forefront of efforts to push the Syrians to free the country's Jews.

Pointing to a letter she received from Foreign Affairs Minister Andre Ouellet, Feld Carr said Canada's supportive policy appears to be continuing with the new Liberal government.

Rabin stands firm on peace concessions

JERUSALEM [Israpet] — Israel announced last Sunday night that it would not attend the next round of talks on the IDF pullout from Jericho and Gaza, due to begin Monday in the Egyptian Red Sea resort town of Taba.

At the weekly cabinet meeting, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin spoke in uncompromising terms when he said Israel would not move "one iota" from the agreement reached in Cairo late last month with the Palestinian delegation.

Rabin said that as far as he was concerned, the "PLO could sweat."

Israel was "in no hurry" and could wait indefinitely to reach an agreement with the PLO.

Rabin told cabinet that in future, all understandings with the PLO will be 'in writing.'

The latest delay began after the government received two faxes from PLO leader Yasser Arafat in Tunis.

According to the Israeli leadership, the communications made completely new demands on Israel, and had nothing to do with the draft agreement reached a week earlier in Cairo.

Government ministers from across the political spectrum endorsed Rabin's tough stand.

Israel's position was even supported by Jordan, which told Arafat that this was his last chance to conclude an agreement with Israel.

King Hussein has made it clear that if the Palestinians cannot agree, there is a real possibility of Jordan concluding a separate accord with Israel.

The current situation underlines the fragmentation of the PLO leadership and the disaffection of PLO officials with Arafat's leadership. Many moderate Palestinians see Arafat's lack of positive leadership helping the radical elements, such as Hamas, to consolidate their power base in the territories.

For many observers, the impasse also points to an almost certain power struggle in the PLO leadership when the Gaza/Jericho First agreement is implemented.

Baycrest project brings artist back to his roots

TORONTO — For Toronto muralist Ian Leventhal, it was a project that brought him full circle.

Last year, the Kanner Heritage Museum of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care asked him to create nine panels to enclose their popular exhibit, A Walk Through the Neighborhood: Scenes from Kensington and the Downtown Jewish Community.

The show, which runs until April 1994, highlights the neighborhood between 1920 and 1950, and celebrates the founding of the Toronto Jewish Old Folks Home, Baycrest's forerunner which was located in the area.

For Leventhal, there was also some personal history. "Working on this exhibit brought my childhood memories back to life," he says. "I didn't live in the area, but my family would drive there to visit my grandfather at his business, the Quality Restaurant. It was like entering another world. In designing these panels I had the freedom to re-create that world through the eyes of a child."

"The results are spectacular," says Pat Dickinson, coordinator of the Kanner Heritage Museum. "The panels form a streetscape which takes people back to the 'old neighborhood,' when most of the Jewish community in Toronto was located in or near Kensington. They add a special vibrancy and have definitely played a part in attracting a record number of visitors.

"Our exhibit is also fortunate to include works by other Toronto artists inspired by Kensington — Aba Bayefsky, Bernice Starkman, Alsa Skuy, Martin Mendelow and Shirley Kofman, to name a few."

Leventhal's work is well-known in Toronto. Now 42, he studied at the Ontario College of Art, the Sara Lawrence College in LaCoste, France, and is an honor graduate of the Fine Arts Program at York University. His interest in murals began shortly after he left school.

"I was hired to do a mural for the Pickle Barrel Restaurant," he remembers. "It was my first opportunity to design a large-scale piece and I enjoyed it very much. The need for bold sweeping strokes and large color blocking of areas suited my style very well."

Although murals are Leventhal's forte, his artistic pursuits have always been multifaceted. In 1980, he became the first Canadian commissioned to design Tiffany's store windows in New York.

"I was persistent," he recalls. "Although Gene Moore, the display director, liked my work it took three visits before he would agree to commission me to decorate five of their store windows, but then he pretty much let me do what I wanted. I pursued work in the United States at that time, because there seemed to be more freedom and appreciation for my light-hearted approach and use of bright colors."

Fortunately, Toronto lightened up, and Leventhal was caught up in a revival of interest in the artistic decoration of buildings.

"The acceptance of murals zoomed in the mid-80s," he explains, "partly because Torontonians had become more sophisticated and appreciated the kind of decorative wall art which was popular in classical Greek or Egyptian culture, but also because they just wanted more beauty in their environment."

Since then Leventhal has completed works for the head office of CITY-TV; a mural and sculpture installation for the City of North York; and wall paintings for various restaurants in Toronto. In addition to his work at Baycrest, he has donated his time and talents to many projects, including a mural for the Play and Learn Centre located in the Forest Hill Public Library; a painting commemorating Jewish musical history at the Leah Posluns Theatre; and, currently, a three-part mural for the religious school at Holy Blossom Temple.

Future projects beckon. This summer, Leventhal visited the old section of Tel Aviv which dates back to the early 20th century. The stucco buildings seem ideal backdrops for murals celebrating the diverse cultures which comprise modern day Israel, and he is actively seeking support for such a project.

"Decorating the buildings on this theme would attract visitors and revitalize the area," he says. "We tend to think of Jerusalem as the historical city, but Tel Aviv also has history worth preserving."

SUCCESSFUL CAMPAIGN CELEBRATED

The construction and development division of State of Israel Bonds held a black tie dinner at the home of Varda and Barry Feiner. The dinner, attended by 100 people, was in celebration of the division's successful 1993 campaign which contributed over $6 million in State of Israel promissory notes to the overall Bonds campaign. Seen here (from left) are Barry Feiner, division chair; George Grossman, Israel's ambassador to the UN; Gad Ya'acobi; Barry Zagdanski and Israel's consul general to Toronto, Dror Zeigerman. Ottawa restaurateur comes to aid of Innu community

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — For some people, the sorrows of the world seem too overwhelming to tackle. But not for Dave Smith. Where this Jewish Ottawa restaurateur sees trouble, he strides in to help.

Smith recently returned from a trip to the Innu community of Davis Inlet on the Labrador coast, where he promised to build a $2 million all-season portable recreation centre in 1994.

The desolate community received international attention last February when six youngsters, intoxicated with gasoline fumes, became suicidal. Smith knew as soon as he read about the incident that he had to do something for the Davis Inlet children.

"When you start to lose kids, five, six, seven years old, sniffing gasoline, plus what else they can get their hands on, it's not fair," said Smith at the kickoff to a campaign to raise funds for the centre. "It's not fair that we just walk away and close our eyes to the problem."

About 65 per cent of the Davis Inlet population of 500 is under age 21, said Smith. They live in extreme poverty in crowded homes without running water and there is nothing for them to do. Smith sees the recreation centre, which will include a skating rink and a substance abuse treatment centre, as a place for them to meet, play sports and get drug counselling and follow-up.

If the Innu gave him the green light, Smith told them, he would raise the money. Bearing trays of smoked meat sandwiches and pickles, Smith and his associate, Jay Acton, showed 50 Innu the plans for the building.

The Innu were skeptical at first.

"They wondered where I was coming from," Smith said in Ottawa a few days later. "They looked into it and they believe me."

On Dec. 13, Smith officially launched the Save Our Native Grandchildren (SONG) campaign in Ottawa to raise money for the recreation centre. Smith plans to take his campaign to Toronto, Montreal and St. John's in February, and to the western provinces in the spring.

Smith is involved with more than 20 charities in Ottawa, including raising money for soup kitchens and hospitals. He supports local and national Jewish charities and institutions, but he is especially moved by those causes that transcend religion, particularly when children are involved.

When he learned a few years ago that Ottawa teenagers who had substance abuse problems had to go to the United States for treatment because there was no local facility, he saw that they got one. He raised $1.3 million to purchase and renovate a three-storey building. The David Smith Youth Drug and Alcohol Treatment Centre opened in June. Smith is also active in programs for young offenders and in Operation Go Home, a program that encourages runaways to return to their families.

"Where there's kids and where there's problems I try to reach out. I think it's very important," Smith said in an interview.

The building Smith wants to put up is completely collapsible and portable so the Innu can take it with them when they relocate in the next few years, as they have been promised they will.

"It's someplace you might not see," Smith told the audience at the kickoff. "It's thousands of miles from here. But just think what we're going to do for the kids. . . . Let's give them a reason to get up in the morning."

Smith owns two Ottawa institutions, Nate's Deli and The Place Next Door. The youngest of 13 children born to Jewish Russian immigrants, Smith says he learned early the value of sharing and charity. He recalls many nights when his parents made room for needy strangers in their apartment over the family shoe repair shop.

"We grew up on St. Patrick St. [in the centre of Ottawa]. We knew what it was to grow up in the ghetto, but we knew if we shared we would survive.

"When I was leaving home, my parents put their arms around me and my father said to me. 'If you have two slices of bread, share one, son. You will survive on the one slice.' And I've always carried that with me," said Smith.

Canadian Jews, Arabs look to Mideast for business

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Under the auspices of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, Canadian Jews and Arabs have launched an unprecedented dialogue on doing business in the Middle East, particularly Gaza and the West Bank.

About 30 Jewish and Arab community representatives, businessmen and academics participated in a recent closed-door roundtable discussion on Canadian business in "a new Middle East." The discussion was chaired by Marc Perron, assistant deputy minister of the Africa and Middle East division of foreign affairs.

A summary of the proceedings was made public.

"I think it was extremely worthwhile for us to sit down and explore opportunities for economic development," said Rob Ritter, executive director of the Canada-Israel Committee. "It was recognized that Canadian investment can make an important contribution to the stability of the region."

He described the mood as "surprising and refreshing" in its friendliness and serious examination of business needs.

David Goldstein, president of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce, said it was significant the Canadian government took this initiative, which he called a "very positive" start to future contact.

He feels it is now up to business people of both communities and their counterparts in Israel and the Arab nations to "beat the drums of opportunity."

"Government tends to get in the way of doing business. I think Jews and Arabs, who share the entrepreneurial spirit, can do deals faster on their own."

Arab (mostly of Palestinian origin) businessmen greatly outnumbered Jewish businessmen at the meeting, but both Goldstein and Ritter said this should not be interpreted as a lack of interest or rejection by the latter.

Izadore Musallam, producer of Solid Entertainment Inc. of Willowdale, Ont., was one of the few Jewish businessmen. Tom Axworthy, executive director of the CRB Foundation, headed by Charles Bronfman, made a presentation on the foundation's Economies of Peace Program.

This was described by Perron as a research project, created and financed by the CRB, that takes a "pro-active, collaborative approach to peace."

Among other Jewish participants were Richard Soberman, chair of the University of Toronto's civil engineering department; and Avraham Diskin, a visiting Israeli professor at Carleton University.

Arab community officials included Farid Ayad, president of the Canadian-Arab Federation; John Schioler, director-general of the Canada-Arab Business Council; Rashed Saleh of Palestine House; and Ian Watson, executive director of the National Council of Canada-Arab Relations.

In his opening remarks, Perron said, "The dramatic changes in the Middle East as a result of the (Sept. 13) peace accord now allow us to discuss business in the region from a very new perspective."

The objective of the meeting was to bring government and the private sector together to exchange views on trade development and investment priorities in Gaza and the West Bank, he said. The department is seeking help in identifying "immediate tangible opportunities for Canadians" that are compatible with the longer-term goal of rebuilding Gaza and the West Bank, and a comprehensive Middle East peace.

Israel, the West Bank and surrounding countries have 27 million people, he noted. "The ideal market is not there yet, but it is coming. My duty is to inform you of that prospect and invite you to prepare for that eventuality," he told the participants.

The Sept. 13 agreement — now stalled — calls for co-operation and joint activity in trade, industry, communications and banking, among other areas of economic development.

Canada is one of seven countries outside the region that sits on the committee charged with channelling $2 billion in international assistance to the Palestinians over the next five years. Canada has pledged $55 million.

"Canada must ensure that any project it undertakes at this time must have tangible and visible effects," Perron said, in order that the Palestinians see peace as beneficial.

His department invited Arab and Jewish Canadians to dialogue, he said, because it believes the most productive ideas will come from the private sector and particularly from the two communities "with roots in the Middle East."

The CRB Foundation's Axworthy observed that bureaucratic rules and complex commercial law in the Middle East have made it difficult to attract global investment capital to Gaza and the West Bank. The CRB Foundation has studied investment potential in the Middle East.

Among the recommendations published after the meeting was the establishment of smaller committees on a sectoral or regional basis to continue the dialogue.

The participants also want Canada to have an office in the region to provide information on market conditions and accessing international aid.

Silverstone elected Network chair

By ELIZABETH SUMMERFIELD
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The new executive of the Jewish Students' Network-Canada was installed on Dec. 25, at the National Convention dinner held at Toronto's Sheraton Centre.

Adam Block of Halifax, and Tamara Kronis and Andrea Silverstone, both of Toronto, ran a close race for the position of national chair, with Silverstone, a York University student, being elected late that night.

The three candidates for national chair had very different ideas of how the organization should evolve in the coming year. Block, who is returning to his studies at Dalhousie University, emphasized the fact that his living outside Toronto would be a plus for Network. Like many students in both the Western region and the Atlantic region, he felt that Network needs to be decentralized. Kronis indicated she hoped to have Network return to its roots of activism. Silverstone ran on a platform which focused on education, resources, and communication.

There was an unusually high national representation at this year's convention, with students from Victoria, Vancouver, Calgary, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, Windsor, St. Catharines, Guelph, Waterloo, Toronto, Montreal, and Halifax.

During the Western region caucus meeting, Brandon Geithner, a student at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver, was elected chair of the Western region. Geithner hopes to gain more authority for the different regions of Network and to decentralize the organization.

Simon Rucker, a student at the University of Toronto, won a close race in the elections for chair of the Central region. Rucker says he wants to push for greater communication within his region, and cited specific examples of campuses he plans to visit in the upcoming semester.

In the Atlantic region, Joshua Ross took office as Atlantic region chair of Network. Ross is also the co-president of APJSF (Atlantic Provinces Jewish Student Federation), which co-ordinates programs and communication for Jewish students across the Maritimes.

In her final speech to convention participants, Talia Klein, outgoing chair of Network, thanked her team and executive. She gave special thanks to Howard Katz, Network's national director, for his hard work and commitment, and to Ruth Milman, the convention co-ordinator, for ensuring that things ran smoothly during the five-day event.

"It's a very long process to bring someone back to Judaism once they've left," said Rabbi Michael Skobac of Jews for Judaism, in a workshop he led at the National Convention of the Jewish Students' Network-Canada. This is why preventive education is so important.

Jews for Judaism was formed 10 years ago to combat Christian missionaries that target Jews, said Rabbi Skobac.

At the University of Toronto, where he works at the Jewish Student Union, the rabbi said the results of a test he gave led him to feel that Jewish students know more about Christianity than about their own religion.

"We're very much caught off guard when it comes to spirituality. We've very much stripped Judaism of its spirituality," he said. This makes Jews particularly vulnerable to Christian missionaries.

Rabbi Skobac's workshop focused on a specific group of Christians who believe in the Bible literally, go to Church regularly, and focus on heaven and hell. He explained that Born Again Christians believe that they will go to heaven and that everyone else will go to hell.

"We're dealing with a segment of the Christian world that is committed to saving the rest of the world from going to hell," said Rabbi Skobac.

He stated that of the approximately 250 million people living in North America, about 75 million are Born Again Christians, obsessed with converting Jews.

Mazon Canada allocates $4,000 to aid Sarajevo Jews

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mazon Canada has allocated $4,000 for food to aid the tiny Jewish community remaining in Sarajevo.

The grant, Mazon's largest ever single allocation, will be sent to the Jewish community in Split, Croatia, where it will be used to obtain food that will be shipped to Sarajevo. Trucks emblazoned with "La Benovalencija," the Jewish community's humanitarian organization, have on many occasions received the permission of all sides to pass through military lines, said Berto Levi, a native of Sarajevo who now lives in Toronto.

Approximately 450 Jews remain in the Bosnian capital, he said. Most either could not or did not wish to leave their homes.

Levi, who arrived in Canada about a year ago, said the Jewish community remaining in Sarajevo is located in the older, central section of the city which is subjected to frequent bombardments.

La Benovalencija runs a public kitchen in the Jewish community centre, for the city's remaining Jewish population and for others in need. There is no telephone link to the Jews remaining in Sarajevo, but the Jewish communities in Belgrade, Split and Zagreb maintain radio contact with their compatriots, he said.

'All of us are very worried'

Levi, whose grandmother and mother-in-law remain in the Bosnian capital, said he has had no contact with either for about three or four months.

"All of us are very worried because we can't see the end of this war," Levi said. "The old part of the city is destroyed."

Marilyn Aarons-Guttman, executive-director of Mazon, said the idea to assist the Jews of Sarajevo came after she heard Levi speak on the Balkan war to the congregation at Temple Emanu-El. She spoke to Levi afterwards and he later filed an application to Mazon for a grant.

Mazon Canada is a non-profit organization that raises and allocates funds to grassroots organizations like food banks and soup kitchens that feed the needy.

The organization distributed $69,000 in its fall round of allocations, Aarons-Guttman said. Despite the recession, Mazon's total 1993 allocation is the highest in the organization's seven-year history, reaching $123,500, up from $103,500 in 1992.

So far, in its seven years of operations, Mazon Canada has allocated a cumulative total of $472,650.

Before the Sarajevo grant, the largest single sum distributed by Mazon was $3,500, sent to B'nai Brith Women of Vancouver in the fall 1993 allocation. Forty-six organizations received Mazon grants in the most recent round of allocations, including the Albert County Action Committee of Riverview, NB, the Fort McMurray Food Bank Association, in Fort McMurray, Alta. and Tomchai Shabbos in Toronto.

Aarons-Guttman attributed Mazon's recent success in raising funds to a number of factors. Small donations are up, she said, and "people are responding because they understand what hunger is." She said another factor is that "the raising of funds is so deeply entrenched in our community, it feels right" to donate money.

Summer seminar set

MONTREAL — A summer seminar on brain imaging is being hosted by the Adams Super-Center for Brain Studies at Tel Aviv University.

Centre director Dr. David Horn said nine speakers have been confirmed for the June 5 to 10 seminar.

The centre, which co-ordinates neuroscientific research, was funded by Annie and Marcel Adams of Montreal.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

PAGHIS

I am indebted to Sarah Faerman, a member of the Jewish Genealogical Association of Toronto, for her suggestion on the origin of the surname Paghis.

She ventures the opinion that the name may be matronymic in origin, that is, derived from the feminine given name Fayge, itself a derivation of Fagel or Vogel (bird).

The name may have been Pfages, where the letters 'p' and 'f' combine to make the sound 'f' as in Pfeffer or Pfeiffer.

By the way, Faerman derives from the German word for fire and denotes an ardent or enthusiastic person.

CHAPCHIK

In 1827, the Russian government issued a decree for compulsory military service in the Russian army. The Kahal, the Jewish communal organization, was charged with implementing the decree. It established a special service of men to hunt and recruit draft dodgers. They were called 'chaper' or 'chapchik' from the Yiddish word chappen (to catch).

TORONTO — The New Brunswick Court of Appeal has overturned a ruling by a provincial human rights inquiry that had forced the removal of teacher Malcolm Ross from a Moncton-area school. The ruling opens the door for Ross' possible reinstatement as a teacher.

Jewish organizations, including Canadian Jewish Congress, which participated in the case as an intervener, called on the province to appeal the 2-1 decision to the Supreme Court of Canada.

In a letter to New Brunswick Premier Frank McKenna, Congress president Irving Abella wrote that "at a time when we are struggling to come to grips with those hatemongers who would sow the seeds of divisiveness within our society, we are deeply disappointed that a judicial decision could be rendered that in effect gives permission for our school boards to employ bigots and racists."

The decision, if unchallenged, could have "potentially negative impact on human rights legislation," Abella added.

Cheryl Reid, superintendent of schools for District 2 in Moncton, said the board's lawyers are currently examining the court ruling. Ross' future with the board and his possible reinstatement as a teacher may be discussed at a meeting of the board of trustees later this month, she said.

The Ross case has been a cause celebre in Moncton for years. The former Moncton teacher is author of several books and letters that allege Jews are conspiring to undermine Christianity.

After fruitless attempts by a number of people to convince the provincial attorney general to charge him with promoting hatred, Moncton parent David Attis, who is also a national officer of Congress, laid a complaint with the Human Rights Commission alleging that by employing Ross, the school district was failing to provide a service free of discrimination.

Law professor Brian Bruce, who headed the inquiry into the Ross case, upheld the complaint and ordered Ross removed from the classroom. He was given other duties.

A judicial review upheld the order, but Ross took his case to the Court of Appeal.

Writing for the majority of the court, New Brunswick Chief Justice Willam Hoyt said the order that removed Ross from the classroom violated his constitutional rights to freedom of speech. That order, he continued, was not saved by Section 1 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which permits violations of fundamental rights if they can be justified in a free and democratic society.

"We must determine if the silencing of Ross' anti-Semitic views is such an important public objective that his constitutional rights to freedom of expression and speech can be overridden," Hoyt wrote. The purpose of Ross' removal from the class is not sufficiently "pressing and substantial before the constitutional guarantees. . . can be overridden," the court ruled.

Evidence at the human rights hearing did not show Ross attempted to further his views in the classroom, the judgment continued. "It must be remembered that it was Ross' activities outside the school that attracted Attis' complaint. The evidence does not disclose that Ross ever used or contended that he was free to use his teaching postion to further his religious views."

Judge Patrick Ryan, writing the minority opinion, suggested that the Human Rights Commission described the issue correctly: "The rights and freedoms specifically guaranteed by the Charter, including those of speech and religion, may be measured against the underlying values and principles of a free and democratic society which are their very genesis, and limited where to do so furthers those values and principles.

Commitment to social justice

"Included in these are the inherent dignity of the human being, commitment to social justice and equality and respect for cultural and group identity. To give free reign to the asserted freedom of speech and religion of Ross would be to trample upon these underlying values and principles, themselves having the status of entrenched rights under the Charter and in international law."

Turning to Ross' activities, Ryan stated "the wrong is in the continued discrimination publicly promoted by Ross, a public servant, as a role model to children. He is known as an elementary school teacher whether in the classroom or outside of it where he is promoting discrimination and prejudice. . . To draw the line at the classroom door is an unrealistic barrier in this burgeoning age of information and communication."

Attis said "I am very disappointed with the decision. It's now up to the HRC [Human Rights Commission] to appeal."

In urging that an appeal be launched, Abella said "any parent from a minority group with a child in the [Moncton] school system could not help but feel that their child's right to fair and equal treatment, free from racial and religious discrimination, has been jeopardized with Ross in the classroom."

"We are shocked and dismayed," said Karen Mock, national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada. "There is something deeply wrong when a man with openly racist and bigoted views is allowed to teach in the classroom. It makes a sham of the school board's and society's policies of teaching tolerance, promoting human rights and fighting racism."

The Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association said it was "deeply troubled" by the court decision. "Canadians have a right not to be discriminated against and the various government agencies and the judiciary must see to it that they are not discriminated against," said vice-chair Sabina Citron.

The court's decision also prompted several editorials and opinion pieces in various newspapers in Canada. The Globe and Mail, in an editorial headed "To tolerate is not to condone," applauded the ruling. It called the decision a "small but significant victory" for free expression.

The court upheld the principle that "to tolerate is not to condone; that what a person may believe or say in private life is neither to his favor nor his detriment in finding employment, but simply irrelevant," said the editorial.

The Montreal Gazette, however, took issue with the court ruling. In an editorial headed, "Giving a licence to hatred," it wrote that "in its efforts to be tolerant, the court in effect is giving carte blanche to people with intolerant views to hold public positions of influence among young people. No one entrusted with teaching children should have the right to undermine, even indirectly, the sense of humanity that is essential for a just, compassionate society.

"Ross stands for contempt unto others."

An editorial page column in the Halifax Chronicle Herald also took issue with the ruling, saying the court had "taken a strange view of religious freedom and standards for teachers."

The majority decision "tips the scales away from teacher responsibility in favor of the bigot's freedom of 'religion' and expression," the editorial stated.

"Bogus scholarship alone is reason enough to oust Ross from the classroom. A teacher can't credibly claim to be a professional in the classroom in one discipline while publishing gross falsehoods in another in his spare time. Standards demonstrated by an educator in any published work reflect on that person's professional integrity and credibility.

"Parents and children have a right to judge teachers on high standards," the Chronicle Herald editorial continues. "Teachers can't be role models in everything. But society expects them to be reasonable models of tolerance and of scholarship in whatever they do. Checking bigotry and bad scholarship at the school house door isn't good enough. Which is why New Brunswick should appeal this decision to the Supreme Court where, hopefully, common sense will prevail."

Pollard's sister asks for support

By ELIZABETH SUMMERFIELD
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Recent editorials opposing clemency for Jonathan Pollard in the New York Times, Washington Post and Los Angeles Times are actually increasing support for him, his sister Carol told the 16th annual national convention of the Jewish Students' Network-Canada.

Carol Pollard is the executive director of Citizens for Justice, an organization founded five years ago to assist her brother, and which now helps others seeking justice through the legal system.

Outlining the events that led to Jonathan Pollard's conviction for treason in 1985, Pollard offered her interpretation of her brother's actions at the time.

She said that when he was working for the Department of Naval Intelligence as a civilian analyst, he had access to information regarding Syrian and Iraqi production of poison gas, as well as nuclear and biological weapons.

When the United States did not pass on this information to Israel in accordance with a U.S.-Israeli exchange of information treaty, her brother felt that an all-out war was probable because Israel did not know of the build-up of military armaments along its borders.

Therefore, she said, he relayed this information to Israel because he felt that "Israel was fulfilling its end of the bargain; Jonathan's superiors were selectively withholding information from Israel."

Subsequently, he freely admitted his actions and explained the reasons for them.

Believing that his crime was "passing classified information to an ally," he "entered a plea bargain at the request of our [U.S.] government," after being told that a request would be made for a sentence of two to four years, usual in such cases.

Carol Pollard

However, she said, although most people receive the sentence agreed upon in plea bargaining, in this case, "One hour before the sentencing hearing which was held in secret, Caspar Weinberger [then Secretary of Defence] delivered a memorandum to the judge asking for the stiffest possible sentence commensurate with Jonathan's treasonous behavior; [although] he was never accused of treason by the U.S. government."

Over the next ten and a half months, his sister said, Jonathan was in a ward for the criminally insane, but with no need for treatment clearly indicated on his official papers. Eventually he was moved to a penitentiary in Marion, Illinois, where he spent 23 hours a day in solitary confinement. Six months ago he was moved to a correctional institution in North Carolina.

Although both she and her brother admit that he clearly broke the law, Pollard said she and others feel that her brother was the victim of political vengeance. "And political vengeance should not stand for a legal system in a democratic society."

Pollard said that some positive activities on her brother's behalf have occurred recently. For example, Hollywood actor Jon Voigt called a press conference with a group of fellow actors at the Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles to ask President Clinton to give Jonathan Pollard a reprieve.

She urged her audience to call the White House comments line and ask President Clinton to commute Jonathan's sentence.

Bourassa's departure elicits mixed feelings

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish Quebecers have mixed feelings about Robert Bourassa, who steps down as premier Jan. 11. The memories of some are dominated by the French-only sign law Bill 178 — now defunct — and Bill 22, which in 1974 established French as Quebec's dominant language.

But those who know the man credit him with a sensitivity to the community's concerns and a personal warmth belied by his public image.

Bourassa had little direct contact with the Jewish community during his four terms of office, except for receiving its official representatives when they came calling.

But Victor Goldbloom, now federal Commissioner of Official Languages, says it should be remembered that Bourassa was the first Quebec premier to name a Jew to cabinet. In his first year in office in 1970, Bourassa appointed Goldbloom, then MNA for D'Arcy McGee, to the new post of environment minister.

"This broke a longstanding tradition of not appointing a member of the Jewish community to the cabinet no matter how competent they may be," Goldbloom said.

"In matters of that kind, Mr. Bourassa was entirely fair-minded. He appreciated the contribution a person could make regardless of origin."

Indeed, Goldbloom was entrusted with several high-profile tasks, including promotion of the James Bay hydroelectric power project and responsibility for the Olympic Installations Board, as well as double duty as municipal affairs minister.

Goldbloom said Bourassa also supported him in his efforts to get funding to Jewish day schools. The previous Union Nationale government had provided a year's worth of funds in 1969. The Bourassa government made it ongoing.

"Some senior education departments officials were against it, and I had to go to bat for continued funding at least three or four times, with the support of Mr. Bourassa, who personally favored it."

Goldbloom said Bourassa was behind the 1972 legislation that gave Jews the right to vote and stand for office in public school board elections.

Goldbloom thinks Bourassa's image of governing according to public opinion and being emotionally cold are unjust.

"If he appeared indecisive, you have to consider the difficult situations he had to deal with because of Quebec nationalism...but when in the crunch he came down clearly on the side of Canadian unity."

As a man, Bourassa is "much more human" than the public perceives, he said.

"While I think Bill 178 was an error...it would be unfair if that was the only thing Mr. Bourassa was remembered for."

Herbert Marx, who was justice minister under Bourassa from 1985 until he resigned at the end of 1988 to protest Bill 178, described Bourassa as a brilliant and empathetic man, who was never vindictive.

Marx, now a justice of Quebec Superior Court, said he could not comment on politics, but said he and at least six other ministers were appointed despite having not supported Bourassa in his second leadership bid.

Bourassa was a "progressive," when it came to social policy, said Marx, quickly making resources available for battered women.

"I would agree with what Eric Kierans once said: 'Bourassa will be remembered as Canada's best politician'...You can fault how he did it, but Bourassa's main goal was the welfare of Quebec."

Marx played a key role in convincing Bourassa to accept an honorary degree from Tel Aviv University in 1987, the first such honor he accepted.

"He said to me, 'you take the degree and I'll make the speech.' "

Bourassa came to Shaar Hashomayim synagogue for the conferral. At his request, the event received little publicity.

The citation praised him for being "dedicated to democracy and devoted to the harmonious co-existence of the many cultures and faith communities" of Quebec, as well as a friend to the State of Israel.

The previous year, 1986, Bourassa was guest speaker at a dinner in honor of grocery store founder Sam Steinberg's family, a benefit for Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science.

During the same term, he spoke at a breakfast at Beth Ora synagogue in St. Laurent, his own riding and home to a significant Jewish population.

"He was always very cooperative...I would certainly consider him a friend of the community," said Beth Ora past president Manuel Dalfen.

Although he could not recall Bourassa making a personal statement after Beth Ora was daubed with Nazi-style graffiti a year ago, minister Monique Gagnon-Tremblay addressed a rally at the synagogue to denounce the wave of attacks. Bourassa did issue a statement when the Jewish cemetery in Ste. Foy was vandalized a couple of years before.

But after the 1989 election, Bourassa had no public contact with the Jewish community. Many felt that outcry against Bill 178 and support for the Equality Party had left him wary of the community.

Russell Copeman, Bourassa's Jewish constituency aide, insists his boss "felt no sense of betrayal.

"Robert Bourassa doesn't have a vindicative bone in his body. He may have been disappointed by the reaction, but he held no grudge."

Copeman knows Bourassa to be a "very warm, generous man. It's amazing the difference in his public and private images."

Conrad Shatner, who was briefly president of the Equality D'Arcy McGee riding association, said he met with Bourassa in 1985 when Shatner was a vice-president of B'nai Brith. He said he came away feeling Bourassa was, above all, a pragmatist.

"I think he had a strong feeling for the community's concerns, but he was the consummate politician. He had lost one election (1976) over language, and he wasn't going to lose another one that way."

Shatner believes Bourassa is a fundamentally federalist and would have modified the language laws earlier, if the climate in the province had allowed.

Canadian Jewish Congress Quebec region executive director Michael Crelinsten said Bourassa's meeting with representatives of Jewish organizations visiting the National Assembly at the end of November is evidence of his genuine respect and affection for the community, despite some "vehement disagreements" over the years.

Crelinsten said there can be no doubt of the seriousness with which Bourassa viewed the issue of anti-Semitism and racism. "He was very, very supportive of our community."

He is grateful the Bourassa government maintained a high level of financial support for the Jewish day schools, despite criticism of "ethnic" schools by those favoring the integrationist approach.

Bourassa and his government, Crelinsten thinks, paid heed to the Jewish community's reaction to various issues because it saw the community as "a benchmark in how to deal with minorities."

Although Bourassa's political fortunes did not rest with Jewish voters, Crelinsten feels the community's input was "not irrelevant in his policy formulations."

Congress has welcomed Bill 86, the new language law that replaces Bill 178.

With this major modification, Crelinsten sees the Jewish community now returning to the Liberals, a party it has had a "natural affinity" with since Confederation.

Pollard's rabbi refutes accusations

WASHINGTON (AP) — Jonathan Pollard's rabbi challenged the government last week to prove accusations that Pollard has been a conduit for classified information passed from prison.

Rabbi Avi Weiss of New York, in a letter to U.S. President Bill Clinton, sought to rebut the contention of former Defence Secretary Les Aspin that Pollard had tried to slip classified information into 14 letters subsequently monitored by prison authorities.

Pollard is the former Navy analyst serving a life term after being convicted in 1987 of passing classified information to Israel. Clinton is considering a plea for commutation of his sentence to time already served.

Aspin, whose term as defence secretary ended with the new year and who opposes clemency, told the White House that Pollard had put classified information he remembered into his letters. Aspin did not say to whom the letters were addressed.

Weiss said that after he visited Pollard in August 1988 at a federal penitentiary in Marion, Ill., he was accused by the associate warden of being a conduit for Pollard's disclosure of classified information.

He said the prison official, C.W. Scott, told him the prison had monitored Pollard's conversation with Weiss.

After he protested, the rabbi said, he won an apology from Scott's superiors and was told the charge was "a ploy to extract information from me."

"What occurred to me personally has allowed me to better understand how certain quarters of government will leave no stone unturned in their efforts to ensure Jonathan Pollard's continued incarceration," Weiss wrote Clinton.

"If Secretary Aspin truly possesses evidence that Pollard has breached security constraints in his correspondence from prison (which Pollard has always known is subject to the most intense scrutiny and censorship), let him disclose it so that the allegations can be met."

According to The New York Times, Aspin's written recommendation to Clinton charged Pollard "has included classified information in 14 of his letters, most recently in 1992, including information classified at the Top Secret Codeword level.

"He clearly remembers classified information which he still has the ability to compromise."

Top Secret Codeword refers to information from such sources as satellites and electronic eavesdropping devices.

Aspin said there were "ample indications" that Pollard might immigrate to Israel if released. "Especially, if he leaves the country, Pollard would continue to present a risk of further damage to the nation," the letter said, according to The Times.

Clinton has made no decision in the Pollard affair as of last Monday, said White House spokesman Jeff Eller.

Pollard's lawyer, Theodore B. Olson, told the Times that neither Olson nor Pollard had ever been told that Pollard's prison letters violated national security.

Improved relations with Israel seen good for both economies

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — The improvement in relations between Canada and Israel is likely to yield wide-ranging economic benefits for both countries in the near future, according to Canada's ambassdor to Israel Norman Spector.

In an address to the Canadian Jewish Congress National Executive meeting in Tel Aviv, Spector noted that in the last couple of years, the Canada-Israel relationship has changed from a "rocky one" to a much-improved association that may soon produce economic gains for both sides.

Among the promising developments cited by Spector were progress towards the signing of a free trade agreement between Canada and Israel; the establishment of a fund to finance joint Canadian-Israel scientific research; an increase in trade missions; and a review of Canada's defence procurement policy, which has until now prohibited military sales to Israel.

"Three years ago, you couldn't get anyone in Ottawa to even consider the idea of a free trade agreement with Israel," said Spector. "But now, this has changed. It was Prime Minister [Jean] Chretien who raised the issue with Prime Minsiter [Yitzhak] Rabin during his recent visit to Canada." (see box)

A Canadian economic delegation to be led by Canadian external affairs minister Andre Ouellet will probably visit Israel in May.

Spector also revealed that the two countries are on the verge of establishing a new research and development fund that would support joint projects in science and technology. According to the program — which is modelled on the successful U.S.-Israel Binational Science Foundation — each country will allocate $2 million a year for three years.

Canada's defence procurement policy — a traditional sore point for Israeli governments — is also under review. Under current policy, Canada does not sell defence supplies, including many types of telecommunications equipment, to Israel since it is considered to be part of a region in imminent danger of hostility. However, progress in the Middle East peace talks has prompted a review of that policy.

Spector said he was "cautiously optimistic" about the state of Canadian-Israeli relations, adding that the challenges today are economic rather than the political ones of the past.

In explaining the reasons for the previously "rocky relationship" between the two countries, Spector blamed both sides for "needless irritants."

He cited the controversial speech delivered by then external affairs minister Joe Clark to the Canada-Israel Committee in 1988 as one such "needless irritant." Clark had called the current Israeli government's handling of the intifada "unacceptable...illegal...shocking."

The ambassador said lobbying by the Canadian Jewish community had not helped improve Canadian-Israeli relations, calling it "ineffective." He said during his term in the Prime Minister's Office, where he was chief of staff until his January 1992 appointment as Israeli ambassador, he saw no evidence of sustained lobbying by the Jewish community.

"Fortunately, there has been a significant improvement in this over the last couple of years," he said, but added: "I'd be surprised if anyone in Ottawa were to call the Canadian Jewish community the best or most powerful lobby in Canada."

The ambassador attributed the improvement in Canadian-Israeli relations to two main factors: the election of an Israeli government whose policies are more congruent with those of the Canadian government; and the fact that the Canadian public has digested the initial shock of the intifada.

Spector's own contribution to improved relations was pointed out and praised by CJC national executive chair Charles Zaionz.

Canada eyeing free trade with Israel, says Spector

TEL AVIV — The Canadian government is seriously considering signing a free trade agreement with Israel, reversing its longtime reluctance to enter into such an accord, says Canadian Ambassador to Israel Norman Spector.

While Israel has been lobbying for a free trade agreement with Canada for a number of years, Canada has until recently been cool to the idea because the two countries do so little trade, explained Spector. "Israel is perhaps our 43rd largest trading partner," he said. "And Canada is not at the top of Israel's hit parade either."

The change in attitude has come as a result of what Spector termed "Israel's clever trade policy." By signing free trade agreements with the United States, the European Community and most recently the European Free Trade Agreement countries, Israel has left Canada out in the cold. Some 85 percent of all imports to Israel are now covered under various free trade agreements. Canadian imports to Israel are among the remaining 15 percent suject to high tariffs.

"This means that Canadian exporters may face tariffs of 20 per cent or more, whereas our competitors from the United States, Europe and Scandinavia pay no tariffs," said Spector.

"We have to decide whether we're going to be a part of the group that benefits from free trade with Israel, or whether we'll continue being one of the countries that is increasingly shut out of the Israeli market."

Spector said Israel already enjoys virtually tariff-free trade with Ottawa because most of its exports are covered by the General Preferential Tariff for developing countries.

"The benefits of a free trade agreement clearly lie on the Canadian side," said Spector. "I think everyone has now been convinced of this."

Rae seeks increased Israel trade

Canada's current defence procurement policy prohibits Ottawa from conducting any military trade with Israel since it is considered to be a region of conflict. The policy is now under review.

"The clear signs of progress in Israel's talks with the Palestinians make it entirely appropriate that this policy be reviewed," Rae said.

He noted that the United States, the United Kingdom and Australia all purchase military equipment from Israel. "We have to look at what our neighbors are doing. We have peacekeeping forces around the world who need up-to-date equipment. It's only reasonable that we should be able to purchase the best technology for our forces."

He also pointed out that one of the ironies in the present policy is that Canada supplies light armored vehicles to Saudi Arabia, through a contract with the United States.

Rae said a change in policy would also enable Canadian companies to sell defence supplies to Israel and would open the way to partnerships between Canadian and Israeli companies in military industries.

Addressing the national executive of Canadian Jewish Congress, which met in Israel last week, Rae said he would raise the issue of the Arab boycott with Jordanian and Palestinian leaders during his Mideast visit.

"I think we should be trying to get the elimination of the boycott as an essential, accompanying feature to progress in the peace talks."

While in Israel, Rae also held talks with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and President Ezer Weizman.

"No one can come away from a discussion with Prime Minister Rabin or any other Israeli leader without sensing that every step that is taken is based on the fundamental premise that the security interests of Israel must be protected and must be respected by all those who are interested in making peace with Israel," he said. "As a Canadian and as the premier of Ontario, I think it is important to express my appreciation of the primacy of that issue.

Rae added he agreed with Peres' view that there is no alternative to the current peace process.

"I think this is what we must say to the obstructionists on the Palestinian and Arab side. Their way is a dead-end street. There is no alternative to the present course. It is the only thing that makes economic sense — and perhaps this is what will win over the Palestinian community in the end. There is only so much nationalistic rhetoric that you can get away with. People can't eat flags."

After meeting with Israeli and Palestinian business leaders, Rae continued on to Jordan, where he was scheduled to meet with King Hussein and address the Jordanian Businessmen's Association.

The Learning Family

Ulpan Akiva's Innovative program which encourages the shared family experience.

Families from all over the world, as well as from Israel, congregate at Ulpan Akiva's campus, beside the beach in southern Netanya, for a unique family experience combining learning with leisure, enjoying full-board accommodation. Parents and their teenage (over 12 years) children take a part in Hebrew or Arabic courses while in the summer, the younger kids join a day camp nearby (at Moshav Udim).
The families are joining a learning community of Israelis, tourists, temporary residents and new immigrants — Jews and non-Jews — students of all ages, civil servants, teachers on sabbatical and others.
The courses last 24 days or 8 weeks, with 5 hours of classes a day. Then there are loads of social and cultural activities during the remaining hours of the day and evening, plus walks, tours and a study Shabbat.

CANADIAN JEWS & PALESTINIANS SAY YES TO PEACE!

We, as members of the Canadian Jewish and Palestinian communities, wish to express our strong support for the statement of mutual recognition and declaration of principles reached between the government of Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization.

We are, of course, mindful of the difficulties ahead, and the concessions and good will that will be necessary from all sides as the accord hopefully unfolds into a comprehensive, just, and lasting agreement reflecting the national aspirations of both peoples.

Nevertheless, we are greatly encouraged by the political will displayed by the respective leaderships to bring this process to a full peace.

Israel, Vatican establish diplomatic ties

NEW YORK (JTA) — The signing of an accord between Israel and the Vatican opens a new chapter in the nearly 2,000-year-old history of Jewish-Catholic ties, a relationship that has often been characterized by mistrust and hostility.

The agreement, which for the first time establishes formal diplomatic relations between the two governments, cites the "unique nature of the relationship between the Catholic Church and the Jewish people, and of the historic process of reconciliation and growth in mutual understanding and friendship between Catholics and Jews."

The agreement includes a mutual commitment to combat anti-Semitism, racism and religious intolerance, as well as a pledge by the State of Israel to continue to respect and protect Catholic sacred places.

One of the document's 15 points expands on the Vatican's position on anti-Semitism.

"The Holy See takes this occasion to reiterate its condemnation of hatred, persecution and all other manifestations of anti-Semitism directed against the Jewish people and individual Jews anywhere, anytime and by anyone," the document states.

"In particular, the Holy See deplores attacks on Jews and desecration of Jewish synagogues and cemeteries, acts which offend the memory of the victims of the Holocaust," it says.

At the signing ceremony in Jerusalem on Dec. 30, Israel's deputy foreign minister, Yossi Beilin said, "Behind the agreement there are thousands of years of history full of hatred, of fear and ignorance, with a few islands of understanding, of cooperation and of dialogue." Beilin signed the agreement with Monsignor Claudio Celli, the Vatican's undersecretary of state for foreign affairs.

Jewish and Catholic leaders said the accord will have a profound impact on every aspect of the relationship between the Catholic Church and the Jewish people, from political to interreligious.

Daniel Pekarsky, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, welcomed the historic agreement, saying that it is an important step towards the solidification of Israel's standing in the international community.

"The CIC looks forward to the day when Pope John Paul II visits Israel," Pekarsky said.

B'nai Brith Canada's Institute for International Affairs said that the deal augured well for Catholic-Jewish relations.

Rabbi Martin Penn, a B'nai Brith Canada board member, expressed hope that the accord "will increase mutual understanding and friendship.

"The landmark agreement will give impetus to international Catholic/Jewish educational efforts to eradicate prejudice and anti-Semitism, and will hopefully enhance the relationship between Canadian Jews and Catholics," Rabbi Penn said.

Canadian Jewish Congress also lauded the agreement.

"We trust that the Vatican will join the efforts of the Jewish community in its continuing struggle against those who wish to rewrite history by denying the Holocaust," CJC national Israel affairs committee chair Moshe Ronen stated while attending Congress national executive meetings in Tel Aviv.

"The climate has changed dramatically already" as a result of the accord, said Cardinal John O'Connor, archbishop of New York and a leading behind-the-scenes voice who for years lobbied within the church for the Vatican to establish formal diplomatic ties with Israel.

"Israel is a kind of concrete embodiment of the great spirit of Judaism and is the representation of Jews throughout the world, a people that has been persecuted and dispersed, sometimes by Catholics," O'Connor said during a news conference at his residence.

The Vatican now expects to play a more prominent role in the effort to create peace between the Jewish state and the Palestinians and on negotiations over the future of Jerusalem.

In the accord, the Holy See reserves to speak out as "a moral voice," but agrees to remain "a stranger to all merely temporal conflicts," specifically those related to "disputed territories and unsettled borders."

In Jerusalem, Beilin said the Vatican had expressed interest in taking part in the five multilateral working groups of the Middle East peace process that are dealing with such regional issues as water resources, refugees, arms control, the environment and economic cooperation.

According to Celli, the Vatican's undersecretary of state for foreign affairs, not yet resolved is the status of Jerusalem.

We need "an international warranty in order to protect, to save, to recognize (the uniqueness) of the city for the three monotheistic religions," he said.

Also remaining unresolved is the location of the Vatican's embassy in Israel.

The Vatican expects to establish it in Tel Aviv, possibly in Jaffa, a municipality just north of Tel Aviv that is home to a large Palestinian population.

The accord was signed in Jerusalem with little fanfare, and the simple ceremony in Israel's capital concluded with the lifting of glasses of champagne.

A toast to Israel and the Vatican was also offered in New York by O'Connor at a small reception attended by representatives of Jewish and Catholic groups that had long been working with him on the issue.

Ceremonies involving Israeli officials and local Jewish and Catholic leaders also took place in Washington and a handful of other cities around the United States.

The Synagogue Council of America, an umbrella group representing the three largest denominations of Judaism, issued a joint statement hailing the agreement with the National Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Australia ends prosecutions of Nazi war criminals

SYDNEY (JTA) — Australia's prosecution of Nazi war criminals living in that country — watched closely by Canada's own war crimes unit — has effectively come to an end.

Late last month, Michael Rozones, the director of public prosecutions, withdrew charges against accused Nazi war criminal Heinrich Wagner on grounds of poor health.

Wagner, accused of murdering more than 100 Jews in Ukraine, suffered a heart attack late last month and doctors have advised that a continuation of the case against him could result in his death.

A leading Jewish cardiologist, Dr. Leon Zimmet of Adelaide, was one of three doctors whose evidence led to the dropping of charges. All three agreed Wagner was unfit to stand trial.

The decision to terminate the case against Wagner, who had pleaded not guilty, comes seven years after an Australian government investigation determined that it was "more likely than not" that a significant number of Nazi murderers entered Australia at the end of World War II.

None of the four men who have been accused of or stood trial for war crimes here have been convicted. All are residents of the South Australia city of Adelaide.

A representative of the Public Prosecutor's Office told the Australian media that further legal proceedings under the Australian War Crimes legislation, passed in 1988, are not expected.

Government fails to get convictions

The decision to drop the charges against Wagner came as the prosecution investigating team was in Germany collecting evidence against him.

Wagner was on trial for the 1942 murders of 104 Jews and 19 specially targeted children of Jewish fathers in the Ukrainian village of Izrailovka.

The Jewish community here has accepted the course of events, noting that due legal process was followed.

Isi Leibler, president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, said that "Australia behaved as well as any country could have been expected to behave under the circumstances.

"Investigations were conducted and prosecutions were initiated, despite the time which had elapsed and the complex legal nature of trials arising from the War Crimes Laws."

He said such trials "would have been unnecessary if Australia had appropriate immigration procedures in place in the 1940s and 1950s."

"The tragedy is compounded by the fact trials did not take place decades ago," Leibler said.

Australian Attorney General Michael Lavarch defended the government for having passed legislation to prosecute accused Nazi war criminals, despite the government's failure to secure convictions.

He said the evidence that had been uncovered in a 1986 review of the entry of suspected Nazi war criminals into Australia had given the government little alternative other than prosecuting accused Nazis.

Funding cut off for special unit

Last year, charges against Mikolay Berezowsky were dismissed by an Adelaide magistrate. In June, a 12-person jury found charges against Ivan Polyukhovich unproven after the judge advised the jury that it was nearly impossible to prove charges so many years after the crimes had been committed.

All three had been accused of murder in Nazi-occupied Ukraine.

Funding for the Special Investigations Unit of the federal police ceased last year and is unlikely to be renewed to allow completion of the small number of outstanding cases.

Technically, the Australian Federal Police can investigate allegations under the War Crimes Act, but local observers believe there is virtually no chance that will happen.

Australia's war crimes effort began seven years ago after the Australian Broadcasting Corporation ran a series of radio reports called "Nazis in Australia."

In December, 1986, a former deputy head of the Attorney-General's department, Andrew Menzies, tabled a landmark report stating there was enough evidence of suspected Nazi war criminals living in Australia and recommending that a special investigations unit be set up.

Four months later, the government established the Special Investigations Unit, which followed up on about 800 allegations.

Two years later, the unit announced it did not expect more than 12 cases to warrant prosecution.

In the letter, Ouellet referred to the October drop-off of exit permits and he states that "our ambassador in Damascus repeatedly expresses his concern about these renewed restrictions to the Syrian authorities, including several ministers."

Feld Carr suggested that "for everything done in Syria, there is a price, and not just a financial price. So we have to sit back and watch what [Assad] will ask for."

Shabbat Zachor, the annual Shabbat of Remembrance for the Jewish community of Syria, will be held this year on Feb. 19. It commemorates the yahrzeit of six young Damascus Jews who were killed while trying to escape from Syria in 1974.

On Shabbat Zachor, congregations in synagogues across Canada and in other Jewish communities say prayers for the freedom of the Jews of Syria. The tradition originated in 1975 at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto, and has since spread around the world.

The News in Brief

WZO Streamlines Agency

JERUSALEM — The World Zionist Organization is to fire some 20 of its 190 employees in an attempt to make the body more efficient, Treasurer Hanan Ben-Yehuda recently announced.

He was speaking following a stormy session of the Zionist executive which conditionally approved the 1994 budget for the organization. The budget will be brought up for reappraisal at the end of June, the WZO spokesman said.

The formula for the budget, amounting to $29 million, was approved by both Labor and the Likud before the meeting.

The executive will reconvene on or before July 1, 1994 to re-examine the budget in the light of the committee's recommendations, the spokesman said. It will then decide on the operational lines of the budget for the next half year.

Poor Areas Receive Funding

JERUSALEM — The government and the Jewish Agency will launch a three-year, NIS 760.3 million program early next year to drastically improve the standard of living in 14 localities, Prime Minister's Office director-general Shimon Sheves recently announced.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has approved the plan for projects in the 14 communities and areas.

Funds for the project will come from the development budget of all government ministries. Sheves said the NIS 250 million needed for the program next year has already been included in the 1994 budget, which the Knesset was scheduled to approve.

Zhirinovsky Host May Be Prosecuted

VIENNA — Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky's recent high-profile visit here has ricocheted in the face of the right-wing Austrian businessman who hosted it.

Edwin Neuwirth, the 69-year-old bankrupt timber dealer who hosted Zhirinovsky at an Alpine resort, now faces a judicial investigation for publicly expressing doubt that gas chambers existed in the Nazi concentration camps.

Neuwirth, who told reporters he "does not know of any gas chambers in German concentration camps," set in motion an investigation by Austria's chief prosecutor.

If Neuwirth denied the existence of gas chambers, a punishable offense here, "he could be charged with renewed activity in the national socialistic sense," Chief Prosecutor Dietmar Pacheiner said in Klagenfurt, a city in the Carinithian region of Austria.

New Tel Aviv Mayor Gives Up Knesset Seat

JERUSALEM — Ronni Milo, the recently elected mayor of Tel Aviv, has resigned his Knesset seat following strong public criticism of his announced intention to hold on to his position in the legislature.

In a letter to Knesset Speaker Shevach Weiss, Milo confirmed that he had wanted to keep his seat, at least for a few months, in order to fight from within the Knesset for his city's needs.

His intention had contradicted a promise he made to voters during his campaign that, if he won, he would quit the House and devote himself completely to Tel Aviv's affairs.

Milo's change of heart had provoked an outcry in the media.

Following this, he wrote his letter to the Knesset speaker, saying that "as an elected representative, I bow to the wishes of the majority of the public in my town."

Yeshiva Student Wins Big Lottery Prize

JERUSALEM — A 26-year-old yeshiva student from Jerusalem who spent NIS 12 on a recent Lotto drawing won the NIS 8.9 million prize worth $3 million.

"I believe in the power of prayer, and when the almighty opens his heart and I pray with faith and true devotion, then my prayers are heard," said the man, who presented his winning ticket at the Payis lottery office in Tel Aviv.

He is getting married in two months, and said he had not yet told his fiancee about the prize.

"I want to maintain my normal routine, to help my family, and to thank God deeply for answering my prayers," he said.

Norwegian Officer's Death Protested

TEL AVIV (JTA) — The government of Norway and the United Nations officials have strongly protested the killing by an Israeli tank patrol of a Norwegian officer serving with the U.N. Interim Force in Lebanon.

The incident occurred late Dec. 26 in the Israeli-controlled border security zone of southern Lebanon. Members of an Israel Defense Force unit mistook a UNIFIL patrol for members of the Islamic fundamentalist Hezbollah movement, which has been staging attacks on Israelis.

A second Norwegian soldier was wounded in the incident.

The commander of the Israeli patrol personally apologized for the fatal error to the Norwegian battalion commander whose troops were part of the U.N. forces operating in the region.

The IDF's commander in charge of the Northern Sector has meanwhile called for a commission to investigate the incident.

Zhirinovsky Visit Opposed

SYDNEY, Australia — Leaders of Jewish organizations here are protesting a visit here planned for this month by Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky, but they concede there is little they can do to prevent it.

"The man is a self-confessed racist and anti-Semite. He should stay out of Australia," Mark Leibler, the president of the Australian Zionist Federation, told a local radio interviewer.

"I don't think he should be granted a visa to enter this country," Leibler said.

Despite the protests of Leibler and other Jewish leaders here, government sources have confirmed there are no apparent legal grounds to deny Zhirinovsky entry to Australia.

Diane Shteinman, who is active with the Australian Campaign for Soviet Jewry, acknowledged that the Australian government has no "really legitimate reasons" to deny Zhirinovsky a visa.

Zhirinovsky's anti-Jewish statements have drawn wide notice in the media, along with recollections that this son of a Jewish father once received an invitation, which he sought, to make aliyah, and that he was active in a KGB-backed Jewish cultural organization in the 1980s.

Moscow Shul Destroyed By Fire

NEW YORK — The Marina Roscha synagogue in Moscow, an institution run for decades by the Chabad movement of Lubavitcher Chasidim, has been totally destroyed by a fire of unknown origins.

But the Holy Ark and Torah scrolls were left intact, the synagogue's rabbi reported by telephone from Moscow.

Rabbi Berel Lazar declared the destruction of the wooden synagogue as "total besides a few miracles here and there. I mean, the main miracle is that the sifrei kodesh (sacred books) and Torahs are completely untouched."

He said there were about 30 fire engines and "hundreds of firefighters" trying to extinguish the blaze, which began around 3 a.m. Moscow time on Dec. 30.

There was some speculation that the blaze could have been caused by an electrical problem. The Moscow Fire Department and police said it was impossible to determine the cause of the blaze at this time, Lazar said.

Demjanjuk Battle Resumes

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Justice Department has resumed its legal battle against John Demjanjuk with full force, filing motions in two Ohio federal courts against the man once accused of being Nazi death camp guard "Ivan the Terrible."

In one motion, the Justice Department is appealing a court order that overturned the extradition of Demjanjuk to Israel. In another motion, the department is seeking to reopen the denaturalization case against the Cleveland autoworker.

"Our objective is still to bring about Mr. Demjanjuk's prompt removal from the United States," Attorney General Janet Reno said in a statement.

Rabbi Marshall Meyer Dead At 63

NEW YORK — Rabbi Marshall Meyer, a charismatic Conservative rabbi who invigorated Jewish religious life and championed human rights causes in both Buenos Aires and New York, died Dec. 29 at New York Hospital.

The 63-year-old rabbi suffered from liver cancer and had recently undergone surgery in an unsuccessful attempt to stem the illness.

Rabbi Meyer, a man with a fiery oratorical style who involved himself in progressive and sometimes controversial causes, energized Jewish religious life and human rights activities in the Argentine capital, where he served for 25 years, and then at Congregation B'nai Jeshurun on Manhattan's Upper West Side.

"Go and tell Pharaoh . . . to let the Israelites depart." So God commands Moses in this week's parasha, VaEra. Upon close examination, there's something strange about the command. Abraham was told "lech" (go), but Moses hears "bo" (enter). There's a clear difference between the two, and the Torah seems to have chosen its language carefully.

First, Moses' task will not be simple. He cannot go to Pharaoh and compel him to let Israel leave Egypt with a mere phrase, "Let my people go." No, it will be Moses' task to cajole, to reprove, to enter into a convincing dialogue with the Egyptian monarch. It will be a negotiation in which the power of the Living God is pitted against the power of the world's mightiest king and his minions. In such a situation, it's unthinkable that Moses could command the Pharaoh in one meeting, in one sentence.

Even today, when we face a major challenge in business or personal life, it is often necessary to deal with another who seems to have power over us: a boss, a supplier, a recalcitrant relative. A flat ultimatum seldom produces results. We don't "go and tell." Rather we enter into a protracted conversation, one that may test our patience, our strength, our will. We have to be prepared for such a negotiation, and that is what God was implying when He told Moses, "Bo" (enter).

A mental and spiritual journey to Egypt

The message was clear. Don't expect immediate results. Prepare yourself for a prolonged effort. Make your journey into every Egypt more than mere travel. Make it a mental and spiritual journey that will gird your loins for a challenging exchange.

Perhaps there's another reason why the Torah tells Moses to enter and speak to Pharaoh. Moses was in the wilderness, far from civilization. His pastoral life required little of his nerve and mind. The world of the court where he grew to manhood was far away, and he felt no need to return to it. Suddenly God appears to him and tells him to go back, to re-enter civilization, to re-enter the machinations of the court and its rulership. This re-entry, this "coming in" again to the intrigues of palace life requires just the right verb. So the Torah says, "bo" (enter), but enter to do the work of God.

So also are we commanded. We who live in this civilization are required to enter into it. If we would remain Jews, some say we must stand apart, huddle together, isolate ourselves form the western world's all-levelling tide of conformity. Yet Judaism without an impact on the world is no Judaism at all. It is an isolated tribal affair of unique customs kept on a desert island, worthy perhaps of study, but incapable of directing the flow of the great civilizations around it.

When we accepted our covenant with the One God, we accepted a measure of universalism. It is ineluctable, for the God of all the world who gives a Torah of truth cannot possibly expect that Torah to remain closeted away. Truth must out, and we must bring it out. So it becomes a Jewish task to bring the world the ideals of Judaism. That task cannot be accomplished by a verb as plain as "go." The Jew cannot simply go to work and go home, go to school, go home. Moses' role remains our role. We must enter into civilization and bring to it our demands for freedom, law, and ethics, however unpalatable the pharaohs of the world may find that message.

Israel expecting 500,000th oleh from 'Soviet' republics

JERUSALEM (JTA) — The year's end marked the arrival of 475,000 immigrants to Israel from the republics of the former Soviet Union since the start of the immigration wave in 1989, Jewish Agency Chairman Simcha Dinitz announced in a review of the agency's activities for 1993.

If present political and economic trends in the newly independent states continue, Dinitz said, 100,000 to 120,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union are expected to emigrate annually for each of the next five years. Of these, 70,000 to 80,000 are expected to come to Israel each year.

About 77,000 immigrants arrived from various countries last year, 65,000 of whom came from the ex-Soviet republics and 8,000 from Western countries.

Dinitz said that by the year 2000, the Jewish population of the former Soviet republics, now estimated at 1.4 million, is expected to decrease by 50 percent.

He said the combined efforts of the Jewish Agency and the Israeli government would fulfill the Zionist dream of bringing 1 million Jews to Israel by the year 2000, making Israel's Jewish population the largest in the world with 6 million. The 500,000th immigrant is expected to arrive within the next few months, he said.

Meanwhile, Dinitz said the Jewish Agency had doubled its activities this year in the newly independent states, where 20,000 Jews studied Hebrew and 20,000 youth participated in Zionist activities. A total of 10,000 youths attended 40 Jewish summer camps in Russia and the neighboring republics.

The Jewish Agency also trained 500 local youth leaders as well as 800 Hebrew and Jewish studies teachers.

A program it initiated this year to encourage aliyah sent 40 teams to 150 cities to promote employment projects, programs for youth and programs to familiarize prospective immigrants with the absorption process in Israel.

Also in 1993, 1,000 youth between the ages of 16 and 18 from the newly independent states came to Israel on Youth Aliyah programs, and the Jewish Agency plans to increase the number in 1994.

Dinitz's announcement was issued a day after immigrants from the former Soviet Union staged a demonstration outside the Prime Minister's Office to protest their inability to find anything but menial jobs.

The day before that, recent immigrants from Yemen staged a protest against the government demanding better conditions for their absorption.

Zhirinovsky appealed to Russians' anger, resentment

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Anyone who has visited Russia lately will immediately understand why Vladimir Volfovich Zhirinovsky, a gifted rabble-rouser, managed to win nearly one-quarter of the vote in last month's Russian parliamentary election.

Zhirinovsky's ultra-nationalist and inaptly-named Liberal Democratic party, which emerged as the largest single faction in the lower house of parliament, tapped into the widespread feelings of anger, humiliation and abandonment shared by millions of ordinary Russians.

Essentially, Zhirinovsky — a politician who has been compared to a fascist and described as an anti-Semite — pandered to voters who wanted to register a protest with the authorities.

In the past few years, the fortunes of the Russian people have declined precipitously: The Soviet empire, of which they had been proud, is dead and buried under the rubble of the Cold War. Russia — the successor state of the mighty Soviet Union — is weak and growing weaker as a result of nationalist rebellions within its territory. The armed forces, having retrenched with the loss of empire, no longer command respect. The economy, torn by rampant inflation and rising unemployment, is in deep crisis as Russia struggles to make the painful transition from communism to capitalism. Corruption abounds, and crime is on the increase.

To most Russians, the economic question is of paramount importance.

The rouble has plunged in value compared to hard currencies, prices have skyrocketed and salaries have fallen drastically. With increasing frequency, Russians are hard-pressed to make ends meet. It's estimated that four out of 10 Russians have been impoverished by Russia's descent into near destitution.

For some, the situation is so desperate that they have resorted to selling their household possessions on street corners to put food on the table. It's a far cry from the days, during the Soviet era, when Russians were assured of lifetime employment, bread and a modicum of dignity.

More often than not, a visitor hears the lament that life under communism, at least economically-speaking, was easier than it is today.

Zhirinovsky, a man who seems attuned to the grievances of the masses, exploited this discontent by pledging to protect the poor in Russia's advance to a free market economy. Among other things, he promised vodka — a staple in Russia — at much cheaper prices.

With a practiced eye on law and order, he suggested he would deal harshly with criminals, especially the "southern mafia," a euphemism for swarthy Caucasians who are widely believed to control organized crime.

To arch nationalists who've been humiliated by Russia's decline as a power, Zhirinovsky sounded a strident imperial note, staking territorial claims to Finland, Poland, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia (not to mention Alaska!) And he intimated that Moscow should "protect" Russian minorities living in former Soviet republics.

As for the Middle East, Zhirinovsky is resolutely pro-Arab. During the Gulf War, he expressed support for Saddam Hussein.

Throughout his campaign, Zhirinovsky portrayed himself as a moderate. "I am not a fascist," he said in an interview. "Just the contrary. I have always made efforts in the struggle for human rights."

His rhetoric notwithstanding, Zhirinovsky appears to be a racist, if not an anti-Semite.

During his political career, he has regularly belittled non-Russians and made statements which impugn Jews. He has accused "Zionists" of being the masterminds behind the international banking system, and has said that Jews control the media.

At a news conference following the election, he implied that Jewish TV announcers should be replaced with blue-eyed, blond Russians, and that Jews themselves are to blame for anti-Semitism.

Zhirinovsky has close ties with the far-right German Peoples' Union, whose leader, Gerhard Frey, has pointedly questioned the authenticity of the Holocaust.

In light of Zhirinovsky's prejudices, it's ironic that he's almost certainly of Jewish origin.

Walter Laqueur, the author of the newly-published Black Hundred: The Rise of the Extreme Right in Russia, writes that Zhirinovsky, 47, was born in Alma Ata (now Almaty), the son of a White Russian mother and apparently a Jewish father.

After the death of his father in an auto accident, Zhirinovsky was raised by his mother. In his autobiography, Zhirinovsky concedes that his father's name, Volf, is "not very familiar to a Russian ear."

Being of mixed race, Zhirinovsky had the right under the old Soviet system to choose his nationality when he turned 16. Evidently, Zhirinovsky listed himself as Russian rather than Jewish in his internal passport — a device which enabled him, and innumerable half-Jews like himself, to escape the slings of Soviet anti-Semitism.

Zhirinovsky has been asked if he is half-Jewish, and his stock answer is that he is a "pure Russian." However, according to a story in the New York Times, Zhirinovsky identified himself as a Jew in the late 1980s, when the first sprouts of organized Jewish life appeared in the Soviet Union. People who knew him then said that he was an active member of a Moscow-based Jewish group called Shalom, which disappeared after the formation of the Confederation of Jewish Organizations and Communities (Vaad) in December 1989.

According to Laqueur, Zhirinovsky — a lawyer — founded the Liberal Democratic party in March 1990. Initially, the party was "liberal-centrist," but lurched to the right during its second congress six months later.

Laqueur further writes that extreme rightists either ignored Zhirinovsky or attacked him as a half-Jew, while the "respectable" right tried to keep him at arms's length.

Be that as it may, Zhirinovsky is a force to be reckoned with in Russia. Moderate parties, should they form a united front, may well be able to isolate him and thus render him relatively harmless. But presidential elections are scheduled for 1996, and Zhirinovsky could well unseat the incumbent, Boris Yeltsin, if economic conditions do not improve substantially.

At present, Zhirinovsky is a dangerous demagogue. But in two years, he may be sitting in the president's office.

It's a chilling prospect, with serious ramifications for international relations and the Jewish community in Russia.

Israel is strong enough to take risks for peace

By BEVERLEY STERN

Right-wing opponents of the Israeli-PLO agreement are spending more time slamming the Rabin government and Peace Now in Israel, the United States and Canada, than confronting the implications of the seismic shift in Israel's relationship with the Palestinians since the Sept. 13 accord.

Not that Peace Now or Labor leaders, such as Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, challenge the perogative of the public to criticize the policies of any Israeli government. Rather, they have consistently supported such dissent, both within Israel and in the Diaspora. That is fair game.

What is also fair game is to point out that the far-right among settlers, ultra-Orthodox parties, Likud, the National Religious party, Tsomet and Molodet all fail to acknowledge that the parameters of debate have radically shifted.

The accord between Israel and the PLO is basically only a mutual recognition pact and a declaration of interim self-government arrangements. Nevertheless, it has effectively enshrined the following principles: (1) territorial compromise; (2) talking to the PLO; (3) recognizing the national rights of the Palestinians; (4) ending the military occupation of the West Bank and Gaza; (5) halting the expansion of Jewish settlements in those areas; (6) IDF withdrawal and redeployment to only those areas deemed essential for Israel's security — all of which are fundamental tenets of Peace Now in Israel.

What the right-wing fails to accept is that there is no going back to the status quo, even as popular support for the accord decreases with each terrorist action. The concept of Greater Israel, and the proposition of "peace for peace" have lost their viability, if not their allure, for most Israelis.

The more pragmatic leaders and followers of Likud and the National Religious party recognize that the accord, however controversial and incomplete, is now the central fact of Israel's emerging relationship with the Palestinians, and that its implementation is a prerequisite of future agreements with Arab countries.

The real debate now should be about negotiating the best deal for Israel's future security, and also, at the same time, responding to the Palestinians' quest for national determination, whether that means an independent state, confederation with Jordan or a Benelux economic union between Israel, Palestinians and Jordan — or all three in that sequence — as some are predicting.

Peace Now is not naive about the consequences of the asymmetric price Israel will have to pay — giving up the tangible of territory for the intangible of promises of peace. It will mean painful compromises, but it has always asserted that the best guarantees of Israel's security are: (1) a militarily strong Israel with a qualitative edge over its Arab neighbors; (2) a strong military and strategic relationship with the United States; and (3) ultimately, solid co-existence arrangements with the Palestinians and its Arab neighbors.

For Peace Now, co-existence, also means: (1) building Israeli-Palestinian support for the accord from the ground up, with joint dialogue and projects between Israeli-Palestinian youth, professionals, academics, archeologists and ordinary citizens; and (2) promoting support for the Rabin government's peace initiatives with educational pamphlets, speakers' bureaus, information centres and a high-profile media and public presence.

This type of hands-on, grass roots activity is dubbed "Track-Two diplomacy" by the U.S. State Department, and is deemed essential to the peace process.

That peace is a process of tough mutual compromise by both Israel and its enemies has always been acknowledged by the followers of Peace Now. The "Now" in the name Peace Now is misleading. Israel is a long way from peace with its neighbors, but the quest for that peace must be now — ongoing — and grounded in realism if it is ever to be realized.

Peace Now believes that despite the precariousness of Israel's geography, it is no longer the huge camp of the 1940s, but rather the strongest military and economic power in the Middle East, with a secure strategic relationship with the United States, and international links around the world.

The Rabin government feels that Israel is now strong enough to take risks for peace, and the Peace Now movement supports its efforts 100 per cent.

Malcolm Ross affair has raised serious problems

By STEPHEN SCHEINBERG AND KAREN R. MOCK

The New Brunswick Supreme Court's recent ruling in favor of anti-Semitic school teacher Malcolm Ross is indeed disappointing, but the case raised serious problems from the beginning. The suspension of a teacher was bound to generate questions relating to academic freedom as well as freedom of speech, at a time when our courts are attempting to balance the protection of minorities and the protection of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

But hate propaganda is not a free speech issue. It is the deliberate manipulation of prejudice through the dissemination of lies and half truths — the promotion of hatred against identifiable groups — and in this country is against the law. Why are we again facing a case of a teacher who makes a sham of this country's policies of promoting human rights for all and fighting intolerance wherever it occurs?

Ross, unlike Alberta hatemonger James Keegstra, has never been accused of bringing his racist teachings into the classroom. Yet, he has written, published and disseminated his Holocaust denying and anti-Semitic materials quite widely outside of his place of employment.

In short, Ross is a hatemonger, openly distributing hate propaganda, and should have been tried under the appropriate laws, which the Supreme Court of Canada upheld in the Keegstra and Smith and Andrews cases in 1990. However, only the provincial attorney general currently has the right to initiate a hate propaganda prosecution, and in New Brunswick successive holders of that office refused to do so, perhaps because at the time the Supreme Court had not yet ruled on the hate propaganda statutes.

The failure of the province to use the right law left a small minority, the Jewish community and its allies, without the protection they deserved. They therefore turned to the Human Rights Commission, which, after holding hearings and a board inquiry on the issue, made a decision to suspend Ross because, as an advocate of racist ideas, he served as a poor role model for Moncton students. Creating a poisoned environment in the school is the antithesis of the quest for knowledge, equality and justice. As a result of Ross' appeal, we now have the spectacle of the New Brunswick court protecting Ross' right to express his "sincerely held beliefs" and, in effect, setting aside the suspension.

We believe the case is far from over and should go to the Supreme Court. We would hope the higher court will see the essential contradiction in the New Brunswick ruling. Sincerity is irrelevant and should not be the issue. Ross is not advancing ideas on the alternative organization of society such as fascism, communism or the like, however repugnant they may be. This school teacher, sincerely or not, is a Holocaust denier. He is not merely advocating an unpopular doctrine, nor a rival interpretation of history. Holocaust denial, and the fallacious conspiracy theory that Ross insidiously draws on to support that denial, lack all scientific foundation and Ross's only sincere purpose is to advance the cause of anti-Semitism, Nazi ideology and hate propaganda.

Will the court allow back into the schools a man who is not only a symbol of hatred but one who completely rejects the fundamentals of the academic enterprise and distorts Christian teachings allegedly in the search for truth? Would we allow someone who published material openly promoting drug abuse and praising drug pushers and dealers to teach our children? Not likely, no matter how sincerely he believed in his cause.

The provincial attorneys general who considered the issue have erred in failing to confer their consent to Ross's justified prosecution under the criminal code. A Ross hate propaganda prosecution would have been relatively straightforward. It would not have opened any insinuation that his free speech or academic freedom was at stake.

We have a new federal government and a new justice minister. We urge them to put hate crimes at the top of their priorities. Hate groups are openly recruiting young people in high schools to their racist, neo-Nazi, and violent ideologies. The writing of the likes of Ross, and his very presence in a school environment, does nothing to stop this rise in racism. Indeed, it may even give it a credibility it does not deserve. We have thus far been spared the worst kind of right-wing extremism which is now sweeping through much of Europe, but we must get our legal house in order to cope with — or preferably prevent — the rise of such movements in Canada.

Economic strides

Despite the fact that Israel's political negotiations with the PLO have been like a roller coaster ride, Jerusalem's economic development appears to be going in only one direction — up.

This remarkable news, surprising at a time when restructuring and downsizing have fractured Western economies, has been confirmed by a number of indepedent sources.

Israel's estimated gross domestic product (GDP) is approaching $60 billion — which is approximately three times the GDP of Syria, Lebanon and the territories combined.

Writing in the St. Louis Jewish Light (Dec. 1), Milford Bohm reports that, with the encouragement of the United States, Israel is blazing an economic trail with a successful marketing strategy targeting the former republics of the Soviet Union, the Far East and Latin America.

Israeli firms are hedging their bets about the benefits of peace with Arab neighbors — which would bring additional economic development — by stressing an aggressive marketing strategy for Europe and beyond.

The Knesset recently passed its Free Export Processing Zone legislation during the first reading of the proposed law. When the final third reading occurs, Israel will have one of the world's most dynamic free trade zones and will make investing in the country a much easier exercise.

It is interesting to note that all this burgeoning economic activity is occurring under the Rabin Labor government, a party that has usually been associated with stringent business regulations, support of unions and the welfare state. But as Business Week noted recently "labour leaders are pushing business-oriented programs including corporate tax cuts and stepped-up privatization."

One of the reasons for Israel's dramatic performance in the economic sector has been stated by Malcolm Forbes Jr. of Forbes magazine who said recently that "Israel has got the real intangibles: a hard-working and well educated work force with more brain power than just about any spot on earth. Investors who look beyond the headlines can see that Israel has an enormous amount of potential."

That potential is being realized more and more each day. A successful conclusion of the Israel-PLO accord will further enhance Israel's economic profile and benefit all countries in the Middle East.

Blow for liberty

President Bill Clinton struck a blow for liberty recently when he received Salman Rushdie — the British writer whose life is under threat by Iran — at the White House in Washington. Rushdie, a distinguished novelist, has been in almost perpetual hiding since 1989, when the Islamic fundamentalist regime in Teheran condemned his book, The Satanic Verses, as blasphemous and called for his death.

The late spiritual leader of Iran, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, imposed this hateful fatwa, and his successor, President Hashemi Rafsanjani — a so-called moderate — is not inclined to lift it. What is more, Iran has purposefully wreaked vengeance on foreigners who've been associated with The Satanic Verses. Hitoshi Igarashi, a Japanese translator, was killed in Tokyo in July 1991. The Italian translator, Ettore Capriolo, was stabbed and wounded in Milan the same month. In November 1993, the book's Norwegian publisher, William Nygaard, was shot, though not fatally wounded, outside his home in Oslo.

Iran's vengeful policy is an outgrowth of the January 1979 Islamic revolution which has turned Iran into an intolerant nation disdainful of legitimate criticism. Dissenters are intimidated, imprisoned, tortured and assassinated. Minorities, principally the Bahai sect, are harassed. Let's be clear. Classical Islam is not a narrow-minded faith, but in present-day Iran, it has been transformed into one. Thus the shameful fatwa which has stalked Rushdie for the past number of years.

Iran, however, is not merely a state which squelches artistic and religious freedom as well as political dissent. It is a state which sponsors terrorism, and is in the vanguard of Middle Eastern nations which oppose a fair diplomatic resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict. Iran, for example, is strongly believed to have taken part in the despicable conspiracy to blow up Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland in December 1988. And Iran rails against the 1991 Madrid peace process and Israel's historic agreement with the PLO last year. To this day, the Iranian government — perhaps the most extreme in the Middle East — attacks the very existence of Israel.

Clearly, Iran is outside the political mainstream, a country which should be watched carefully. By receiving Rushdie, the Clinton administration not only made an important and humane gesture to a besieged writer, but put Iran on notice that its policies are worthy of condemnation.

PRIESTS WHO SAVED JEWS

As chair of the Department of History of the Church in the 19th and 20th centuries at the Catholic University of Lublin, in Poland, I was invited to Canada recently to speak about the assistance provided by members of the Polish Catholic clergy to Jews in wartime Poland.

During my talks in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal, several persons came forward with accounts of assistance that were unknown to me. This leads me to believe that there may be more such accounts known to your readers.

I would greatly appreciate receiving brief accounts relating to such incidents, either in Polish or English, at the following address: Zygmunt Zielinski, ul. Niecala 8/90, 20-080 Lublin, Poland.

HIS BLOOD BOILS

In your issue of Nov. 25, Yeshayahu Anug's column made my blood boil.

He is describing the settlers of Judea and Samaria as "fanatics" "extremists" "law breakers" and "retaliating with fury." How does he want them to react when their lives are threatened, and destroyed and no security by the army is given to them? Or better still what would Mr. Anug do if he were in similar situations?

Reading further in the column I see he is saying the "national aspiration of the Arabs in Jerusalem" will have to be accommodated and the settlements in Samaria and Judea will have to be abandoned.

It's a chilul Hashem to write such an opinion in our time.

PLO IN ISRAEL'S HEARTLAND

In his famous letter to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin on Sept. 9, PLO chair Yasser Arafat wrote that (1) the PLO takes responsibility for the cessation of terrorism, and (2) the PLO covenant, calling for the destruction of the State of Israel, will be amended.

Since September, there has been an eight-fold increase in terrorist attacks against Israelis (Binyamin Netanyahu in Toronto this December). Arafat's men have been carrying out murder and, indeed two members of the Fatah unit which murdered Haim Mizrahi had enrolled in the "police" force (Jerusalem Post Nov. 11)! There is no timetable for the amendment of the PLO covenant. In fact, the only side who has to keep to a timetable is Israel.

This is the sorry state of affairs to which our majority government is leading us. Despite the assurances from government spokesmen, there is no chance of avoiding a PLO-run state in the heartland of the Land of Israel. This option was overwhelmingly rejected in last year's elections and, if this is pursued without going to the people for consent, it would make a mockery of Israel's democracy.

RIGHT OF DIASPORA

"It is not for me to tell Israelis what to do."

I have heard this sad refrain often in the past two or three months, the most recent time being by Rabbi Benjamin Friedberg ("Diaspora Has No Right To Decide Future of Israel," CJN, Dec. 2). Rabbi Friedberg then asks, "What are the rights of Diaspora Jews, if any, in reacting to the new arrangement?"

Judaism is based, to a very large extent, on democratic traditions. As such, we in the Diaspora have every right to criticize whatever and whomever we wish. If the criticism is warranted, and thoughtfully presented, it can be an important tool of democracy and of a healthier society. Tied to this, is the long-standing Jewish maxim of Kol Yisrael Areivim Zeh Lazeh — Every Jew is responsible for every other Jew.

It is incumbent upon those in the Diaspora who oppse policies of the Israeli government — the Jewish government — to voice their opposition. It is for lack of this voice that the Israeli government has been allowed to continue in arguably destructive policies such as the current arrangement with the PLO.

QUERIES FEMINIST ROLE

In Joel Jacobson's article of Nov. 18, covering a recent CJC conference in Halifax on the role of women in the Jewish community, he quotes Prof. Ben Schlesinger on the changing status of Jewish women. "There is," says the professor, "no longer the model of women staying home full time, raising children and making latkes for Chanukah parties. That's going out with the new generation."

Prof. Schlesinger may be surprised to know as that, as I write, there are several women downstairs, both young and old, who are baking for upcoming holiday dinners in my shul. I suspect the same is true of numerous other synagogues throughout the country. I have never known even the most dedicated feminist not to enjoy some of the delicacies of Jewish cooking which Jewish women have specialized in and handed down through the ages.

Moreover, if he is right that "the old fashioned model is going out the window," and Jewish women are not taking a primary role in raising Jewish children, then who is? And what are the results? Based upon current Jewish demographics, the answer is not good.

As I review historical material on Chanukah, I am struck by how similar many of the Jewish feminists mentioned in Mr. Jacobson's article sound to the Jewish assimilationists of the Hellenistic times. Both groups wanted to flow with current social trends. Both thought that features of Judaism which impeded Jewish participation in the general world should be abandoned. Both felt threatened by those who held by the traditional ways.

In fact, feminism is no longer a new position but one which has been with us for a generation now, and we are beginning to come to some conclusions. It is by no means accepted by all women or even a majority. Many who "think feminist" play it safe and act traditional, deciding that maybe they should look after their newborn rather than leaving them to some over-worked and underpaid day-care worker (almost always a woman!).

Within the Jewish community, many have been through it and now have second thoughts. The traditional role of Jewish women, however uncomfortable they may feel in it, contributed enormously to Jewish family and community life, and they do not see anyone else replacing it. The burden of proof, therefore, remains on feminism to show that it is a viable position for the Jewish community and not a marginal one for a few.

Senior years can be best period in a person's life

By RABBI GUNTHER W. PLAUT

We Jews order our lives by two calendars, the Jewish and the secular one. We respond to our religious needs by the former and to others by the latter. For me, they both have something in common. When the new year arrives I feel time has flown by too quickly. Which is another way of saying I am getting older.

Writing from the perspective of a senior citizen, I must confess I have become increasingly aware that I am in the last quarter of my life (reckoning it very generously). It is not only during the winder that days get shorter; life offers that same experience.

Yet in many ways this is the best period for many of us who are not suffering from debilitating diseases. Decreasing physical power is not the same as decreasing one's joy in life. Yet, people generally believe that age inevitably brings with it mental incompetence, and that slowing down physically also means a decrease in intellectual capacity.

Nothing can be farther from the truth. Fact is that some things do not matter as much to us as they used to, and others matter more. There is a shifting of priorities, and that can be an opportunity for making life more meaningful.

Rabbi Plaut

One of the problems I meet with and hear about more and more often is the way older people are treated in our society. The biblical command to respect one's elders all too frequently honored only in the breach. For that reason I want to share with you an article by Rabbi Roger C. Klein which I read recently in the Temple Bulletin of Tifereth Israel Congregation in Cleveland. Here are his words:

"We live in a youth culture. Dexterity, boundless energy, bright smiles, wrinkle-free skin are prized and clung to. Aging is feared and the signs of aging are anxiously concealed from others and from ourselves. Abraham Joshua Harchel says derisively: 'Monotheism has acquired a new meaning: the one and only thing that counts is being young. Youth is our god and being young is divine.' To be sure, youth is a very marvellous thing. However, the cult of youth is idolatry. Abraham is the grand old man, but the legend of Faust is pagan.

"The Torah proclaims: 'You shall rise before the aged and show deference to the old.' (Levitious 19:32) Two talmudic rabbis disagree over the meaning of this verse. Rabbi Yose the Galilean says that it means: you shall honor primarily those among the old who are wise and who have acquired great knowledge. Rabbi Yohanan, however, says: you should rise before and show honor to all old people, gentiles as well as Jews, because the elderly have a vast store of wisdom just because they have experienced and lived through so much. "How many adventures of living have befallen them," he exclaims (Kiddushin, 326).

"It is Rabbi Yohanan's opinion that became normative for Judaism. We view the attainment of old age as a victory, not a defeat; as something to be celebrated, not concealed. The aged are our cultural treasure. We are stronger because of their participation in our personal and communal life. We are sturdier when we view wrinkles as the rewards of rich experience and see white hair as the crown of glory."

To which I say a hearty Amen and, with the passing of another year, wish all of you a positive and invigorating outlook on life.

Israel works towards equality for its Arab citizens

By VARDA SHIFFER

As the process of peace moves slowly, taking inevitable turns and detours, it provides an opportunity for us to look at yet another aspect of what will be required to achieve a just and lasting peace. Israel, while working to build peace with its Palestinian neighbors, must also work to improve relations with its own Arab citizens who may serve as an important bridge to peace.

There are 800,000 Arab citizens of Israel, roughly 18% of the population. Although Israel's Arabs have consistently proven their loyalty throughout the country's 45 year history, they are still often viewed with mistrust and suspicion by other Israelis. Where they are provided with the basic rights and privileges of citizenship, they are too often denied basic educational and economic opportunities. If Israel does not deal directly and effectively to address the issues facing its Arab citizens, then it risks replacing its external conflict with an intensified internal one.

Several months ago, when the Israeli government voted to approve the Jericho-Gaza First Accord, J. Matza, a Knesset member from the Likud party, announced that parliament's approval of that agreement depended upon members of Knesset who were PLO supporters, by which he meant Israeli Arab M.K.s. Some suggested that this was a slip of the tongue. But in fact, Matza was in perfect conformity with a tradition of delegitimizing the Arab citizens of Israel.

Last July, in the same fashion, another Likud MK, U. Landau, said with regards to the talks with the PLO, that the prime minister "does not have a mandate to implement the policy of concessions on the Golan Heights and in Jerusalem with the help of votes of MKs who identify with the aims of the PLO, and of Syria."

Although Matza's is a minority view in Israel, it still pervades the consciousness of too many people who believe that Arab Israelis who live, vote and are educated alongside the Jewish majority are not "true" Israelis. This prejudice translates into discrimination against Arab Israelis in virtually every aspect of life.

The fact is that Israeli Arabs have, even under hardship, proven their loyalty to the state of Israel. The overwhelming majority are law-abiding citizens who have never engaged in any activities that have harmed Israel or the security of the state.

Yet Arab Israelis have never been treated as equal partners. From 1948 to 1966, they were under military rule and needed permits to move from one area to another inside Israel. After the Six Day War, when Israel's economy was rapidly developing, Jewish towns and villages received special budget allocations that were not available to Arab villages. No Arab community was declared a development town. And Project Renewal funds were directed mainly to Jewish not Arab neighborhoods.

The practical result of this disparity in the allocation of funds means that today there are still many Arab towns without adequate roads, sewage systems and with very limited municipal services. One out of six Arab children live below the poverty line. And a recent report by Israel's State Comptroller's office points out huge gaps between the Arab and Jewish sectors in almost every aspect of education, both in terms of investments and outcomes.

In addition, because the majority of Arab citizens do not serve in the military, they are covertly discriminated against by being denied substantial benefits that are offered only to those who are soldiers and family members of soldiers. For instance, most Arabs are denied increased children's allowances and special mortgage terms provided to soldiers, even though there is no reasonable connection between service in the army and the extra allowances.

During the last two years of the Likud government, the urgent need to improve municipal services and social welfare in Arab towns and villages was finally recognized. Just before the change in government, the Ministry of Interior adopted a policy of affirmative action on a rather small scale, by allocating special budgets to local authorities.

Finally, at the behest of non-profit organizations that work on behalf of Arab citizens, the government has begun to recognize the urgent need to improve municipal services and social welfare in Arab towns and villages. Budgets for education in the Arab sector were increased substantially. First moves have been made to grant allowances to children of Arab families.

As the peace process moves forward, a host of non-governmental organizations within Israel will intensify their advocacy for equality for Israel's Arab citizens. They will seek an improved educational system, municipal and social services and employment opportunities. They will seek to create conditions within Arab communities that will make possible the prospect of Arab Israelis and Jews living together in mutual respect and dignity.

With the possibility of peace, Arab Israelis have the potential to play a key role in building new relationships with Palestinians across the green line. The time has come for this population, too long relegated to second-class status, to become full participants in the state. It is critical for all people who care about the future of Israel to promote efforts for coexistence between Jewish and Arab Israelis.

Collecting notebooks is one of my favorite things

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

Most women, I am told, fantasize about romance, or wealth, or wild adventure. I fantasize about notebooks.

My most exotic daydream focuses on shelves full of neatly labelled binders, the accumulated paper effluvia of my life gathered up, beaten into hole-punched submission, and tidily catalogued between plastic covers.

I'm not dreaming of anything unattainable here. The core materials — binders, labels, section dividers, even three-hole punchers — are routine commodities at the nearest store. The unattainable elements are time, energy and some sense of just where to begin.

Do I start with family photographs, piles of them begging to be made chronological while I can still tell one infant from another and discern one mountain range from its geological twin? I have envelopes of pictures stacked in teetering pyramids, cupboards jammed with expensively developed stacks of snapshots I have looked at once — albeit with great pleasure — and tucked away against the "some day" when I will organize them into binders, each labeled with destination and year, marching like soldiers down the shelf.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

Or do I begin with Judaic studies class notes, here a stack from the rabbi's lectures, there a stack from women study sessions, here a pile of browning loose sheets accumulated at Aish HaTorah seminars? These compulsively taken notes, the product of adult ed classes randomly pursued for 15 years, are all valuable, and they are all here. I couldn't possibly locate any specific set for you, but I know they're here. I wrote them carefully, stacked them lovingly, hoarded them unceasingly. I just have never filed them in the binders of my dreams.

I have clippings and columns to cut out and punch and bind. I have recipes tucked into cookbooks. I have the accumulated kindergarten artwork of three obviously genius-level artists, my children. These masterpieces are stacked in a couple of cardboard boxes, but I have them, and one day I'll find a notebook big enough. One day, I'll find a day big enough.

I have wonderful crossword puzzles torn from magazines and ready to bind. My bedside drawer is stuffed with New Yorker magazine covers and Absolut vodka ads ready to gather into collections of graphic virtuosity.

Surely a binder would help organize my magazine tear sheets showing arty shots of perfectly decorated rooms, each with a little detail I can learn from (none show stacks of unrestrained paper). Because I make collages, I save anything pretty, but a binder would make them prettier.

Somewhere out there, there's a loose-leaf binder just waiting to hug and hold the clipped-out poems, the hoarded cartoons, the wise clippings of child-raising advice, housekeeping advice, and clutter-busting advice.

I knew there must be a way to organize all my cherished papers, but I didn't know how until my recent visit to my friend Lilia's office. One entire wall was covered with bookcases holding black notebooks with white labels: 1990 Correspondence marched next to 1991 Correspondence, 1989 curriculum outlines lined up next to the 1990 outlines; there were binders for meetings and binders for school board matters, binders for phone messages and binders for memos and meetings. I walked into this gold mine and was struck with the powerful temptation to covet my neighbor's notebooks.

I can resist. I can act. I will bind. I will divide — with tabs — and conquer. I will clip and sort. Loose-leafed, stacked-up, ready for labels and loaded for dream fulfillment, notebook nirvana, here I come. Bolster my one New Year's resolution, faithful reader: go hole-punch something. We'll both feel better.

Revival in St. Petersburg

Sheldon Kirshner visits St. Petersburg and reports on the Jewish revival taking place in that northern Russian city.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

In 1986, when Jakob Tsukerman asked the Communist authorities for permission to publish a one-page Jewish newspaper, his application was summarily rejected.

Tsukerman, a physicist by training and a journalist by vocation, was undaunted. In his heart of hearts, he knew there was a potential readership out there thirsting for Jewish news, despite heavy-handed efforts by the government to suppress what was left of Jewish culture after some seven decades of communism.

A 48-year-old bear of a man, Tsukerman had always wanted to be a publisher. But he repeatedly kept his dream in abeyance as he pursued a career in hydrology. Finally, in 1982, he began publishing an underground almanac on Jewish life in St. Petersburg (formerly Leningrad and Petrograd). This venture lasted until 1985. By then, he was ready to put out an above-ground publication.

Two years later, when Mikhail Gorbachev's brave new world of glasnost and perestroika was already in full swing, he launched a bulletin on Jewish culture and aliyah. Technically, he was in violation of the law. "But the government did not try to stop it."

In May 1990, when the Soviet Union was already in its death throes, Tsukerman, in collaboration with a colleague who has since emigrated to Israel and the Jewish Association of St. Petersburg, brought out what is today the city's sole Jewish newspaper, a bi-weekly called Ami.

For the first three issues, Ami was carefully scrutinized by government censors. But with the passage of legislation proclaiming freedom of the press in the former Soviet Union, Ami took flight and soared. Its circulation is 10,500.

Funded by the Jewish Association of St. Petersburg, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the Bay Area Council for Soviet Jews of San Francisco, Ami is unprepossessing in appearance and anything but profitable. Yet, Tsukerman suggests, it is symbolic of the rebirth of Jewish life in this faded Baltic Sea port since the late 1980s.

According to Vadim Polyansky, a prominent activist, the first Jewish organization sanctioned by the regime emerged in 1988. It was the Leningrad Society for Jewish Culture, now known as the Jewish Association of St. Petersburg.

Within a few years of its formation, other groups surfaced, ranging from a Maccabi sports club — of which Polyansky is chairman — to a Jewish veterans' association. Today, St. Petersburg, with a Jewish population estimated at 120,000, is home to a grand total of 37 organizations, even though the majority reportedly exist on paper only.

Vadim Polyansky

Most notably, there is a B'nai Brith chapter, two children's choirs, an adult choir, a musical and folklore ensemble, and a social welfare fund which caters to the old, sick and needy. St. Petersburg's first of five Jewish day schools — three of which are allotted classroom space in regular secular schools — was opened in 1990. The Jewish University, inaugurated in 1989 and fully accredited as an institute of higher education, has more than 300 students.

The Lubavitch movement, with some 20 branches all over the former Soviet Union, sponsors a kindergarten, a yeshiva, a girls' seminary and a senior citizens' soup kitchen. Once a week, a shoichet comes in from Moscow, but kosher meat is still not widely available, said Rabbi Mendel Pewzner, the Lubavitch representative who hails from Brooklyn.

Rabbi Pewzner presides over the religious court at the Moorish-style Choral Synagogue, the only shul in St. Petersburg and currently the object of an inter-communal struggle for ownership. Its St. Petersburg-born spiritual leader since 1980 has been Rabbi Efim (Chaim) Levitis, a modest man of 42. Tsukerman claims that he lacks deep scholarly erudition, and that he was reputedly a KGB agent during the Communist era.

By all accounts, the ongoing Jewish renaissance in St. Petersburg touches only a limited number of Jews. "Maybe 2,000 to 3,000," said Tsukerman, a walking encyclopedia of the community's development. "Our St. Petersburg Jews are not so Jewish. They're assimilated. They have good jobs, and in general, they don't want to make aliyah. Israel doesn't need so many Russian-speaking engineers, doctors and teachers."

Since 1990, 30,000 Jews have emigrated — 12,000 having gone to Israel, the rest to Germany, the United States, Canada and Australia. Polyansky says that emigration to countries other than Israel is running at 100 to 150 monthly.

Shimon Dolev, director of the Israel Information Centre, disclosed that 200 to 300 emigrants make aliyah every month. Lev Mendelevich, a local Jew, sends olim to Israel via Finland with the assistance of pro-Israel Christians.

Many would-be olim study at Ulpan Chalom, which is bedecked with Israeli flags. At a graduation ceremony, students offered various rationales for emigration.

Tatyana Ritichenko, a 25-year-old chemical engineer, cited Russia's political and economic instability. Natasha Mirkena, a 34-year-old teacher, said she was fed up with anti-Semitism. Andrei Jaglin, a 26-year-old doctor, and Sasha Lechovitsky, a 32-year-old computer programmer, said they hoped to improve the quality of their lives in Israel.

Aeroflot, the Russian airline, has a regularly-scheduled flight to Ben-Gurion Airport once every week. During the months of July and August, El Al also ferries immigrants to Israel.

Dolev, a Soviet immigrant himself, does not expect a dramatic increase in aliyah in the aftermath of the failed Oct. 4 putsch in Moscow. "The Jewish people here believe in Yeltsin," he said, referring to Russia's president, Boris Yeltsin.

* * *

Although the Jewish revival in St. Petersburg is of fairly modest proportions, no one should forget that, Jewishly-speaking, this was once a wasteland.

Outside the Pale of Settlement during czarist times, St. Petersburg attracted Jews despite the prohibition on Jewish settlement. After the 1917 revolution, all such restrictions were lifted. In the 1920s and 1930s, the Jewish population grew rapidly. Two hundred thousand Jews lived in St. Petersburg during the long, bitter Nazi siege.

As elsewhere in the Soviet Union, communism was unkind to the Jewish community. In the early 1960s, in line with Moscow's anti-religious campaign, Jewish bakers were detained for illegally baking matzah, while Jewish youths congregating around the Choral Synagogue on Simchat Torah were arrested.

In 1970, a court in St. Petersburg handed down severe prison sentences to a group of Jews who had been accused of trying to hijack a Soviet airplane to Israel.

Tsukerman was friendly with one of the hijackers, Eduard Kuznetzov, who has since made aliyah and edits a Russian-language newspaper in Israel, Vesti.

Like Kuznetsov, Tsukerman was an activist. In 1961, he was detained for seven hours after having had the temerity to join a Simchat Torah celebration at the Choral Synagogue. Two years later, in the course of a Passover seder at the shul, he was detained yet again. The rector of Leningrad State University, where he was a student, was informed of his after-hour activities. "I had some problems after that," he said without elaborating.

In the wake of the 1967 Six Day War, which galvanized numerous Jews in the Soviet Union, he and some friends founded an underground circle for the study of Hebrew language and Jewish history.

After Kuznetsov and his associates were imprisoned, the police cracked down on the Jewish underground movement, but Tsukerman was not affected.

"I wasn't in the top leadership. At the time, I was employed in an institute of hydrology."

At one point, he seriously considered making aliyah. But by the time he got around to it, the government had tightened the noose on emigration.

Tsukerman, whose ex-wife and 12-year-old daughter reside in the United States, has no immediate plans to leave Russia. Indeed, he intends to start a Jewish book publishing company, as well as a Jewish TV show. "My place is here, to publish Ami. If I can't, I will go to Israel."

He strongly believes that a revitalized Jewish community in St. Petersburg is not an impossible dream, notwithstanding his belief that the younger generation will probably emigrate.

"The rest, I think, will stay."

In the meantime, committed individuals like Rabbi Levitis, Rabbi Pewzner and Pauline Mendelevich are working hard to attend to the needs of those who identify with the community.

"A lot of Jews are distant from religion," said Rabbi Levitis. "We're doing what we can to change this situation."

On Sukkot, Rabbi Pewzner rented St. Petersburg's circus building for a musical evening. The event attracted 2,500 persons. Now plans are afoot for a "big concert" on Chanukah.

For Rabbi Pewzner, hope springs eternal. "We are reaching out to all Jews," he explained, "even assimilated Jews."

Mendelevich, a former lawyer, has been described as the Mother Theresa of St. Petersburg. Aided by a corps of 58 volunteers, the "Joint," local Jewish businessmen and Scandinavian Jews, she provides food, second-hand clothing, linen, drugs and wheelchairs for those in desperate need.

When she founded Lea, her charitable organization, only several hundred people depended on her largesse. But last year, she catered to 22,000 Jews, including 2,000 shut-ins.

"You need 48,000 roubles a month just to get by today," she said. "The people I serve subsist on an average pension of about 16,000 roubles."

Together with Mendelevich, I visited two shut-ins.

Bent, arthritic, hard of hearing and almost blind, 79-year-old spinster Pauline Zimmerman is alone in the world, all her relatives having died. Mendelevich visits her one-room flat regularly, always leaving behind sufficient provisions.

On this sombre day, Mendelevich brought one frozen chicken, a bottle of cooking oil, a bag of rice and of raisins, packages of butter, tea, sugar and powdered milk, three tins of fish, one jar of jam and a bag of cookies.

Zimmerman, I was told, is not left to fend for herself. Twice a week, she receives help from a volunteer who cooks and cleans.

Mendelevich also visited Nina Finkelstein, whose husband and only child, a son, were killed in World War II. Now frail, in her 80s, Finkelstein still mourns their untimely deaths, decrying the fate into she was thrust.

"We must help people like Paulina and Nina," Mendelvich said. "We owe it to them."

Upwards of 50,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union have streamed into Germany in the past several years. The influx, which resembles the Russian-Jewish tidal wave of the 19th century, has doubled Germany's Jewish population and made Germany a magnet for Jewish emigration from the old Soviet Union.

Tens of thousands of Jews from ex-Soviet republics like Russia and Ukraine have set their sights on Germany despite an upsurge of xenophobia and anti-Semitism, according to Roman Spector, vice-president of the Moscow-based Confederation of Jewish Organizations and Communities (Vaad).

Israel, whose raison d'etre is immigration, is naturally miffed. Last June, a Knesset committee called on the German government to "make it difficult" for Soviet Jews to enter Germany. "We have no interest in increasing the size of the Jewish community in Germany," declared committee chairman, Emanuel Zissman.

Germany's ambassador to Russia, Otto von der Gablentz, recognizes the problem. But, he wondered, "Do we, as Germans, have the moral right to reject Jews who wish to live in a modern, democratic country like Germany?"

In any case, Von der Gablentz, who was previously Germany's envoy in Tel Aviv, believes that Israel has "accepted the reality" of the situation.

Soviet Jewish immigration to Germany is a phenomenon that really got under way in 1990, when the now-defunct German Democratic Republic (GDR) was in its death throes.

In March of that year, just a few months before East Germany collapsed and was amalgamated by West Germany, the GDR expressed its willingness to grant refugee status to "persecuted Jews" in the Soviet Union. By April, almost 5,000 Jewish refugees had accepted the offer. The newcomers were accommodated in barracks in an East Berlin suburb.

After German reunification in October 1990, new regulations pertaining to Soviet Jewish refugees came into effect. Today, the largest group of Jewish immigrants are so-called quota refugees, citizens of the former Soviet Union who can prove they are Jewish. They are followed by refugees who have relatives in Germany, and Jews of German origin.

"It's a touchy question, of course," admitted an official in Germany's embassy in Moscow. After the Nazi era, Germany is wary of classifying people on the basis of ethnicity, race or religion.

"We don't ask for documents relating to ancestry," he said, referring to quota refugees. It is sufficient for an applicant to produce an internal passport, which lists nationality.

Soviet Jews stream into Germany

It is, therefore, relatively simple for a Soviet Jew to enter Germany. "For (Soviet) Jews, Germany, after Israel, has by far the least complicated immigration laws and offers good basic social and economic conditions," writes Susanne Spulbeck, a German anthropologist who has studied Soviet Jews. "The United States, Canada and Australia are not prepared to take in Jewish refugees under comparable circumstances."

Despite the spectre of deep recession, with its high unemployment rate, a consensus exists that Jewish refugees should be allowed into Germany, said the embassy official. "There is no real domestic discussion with regard to this issue. It has the consent of all federal state governments."

Bonn tries to spread the refugees evenly around the country. In practice, the majority join relatives and friends in Berlin, the capital-to-be. As a result, Berlin's Jewish community has grown significantly, while Frankfurt's has increased and Dusseldorf's has nearly doubled.

Still, as observers have noted, many Soviet Jews in Germany have little Jewish identity, and do not become members of the community. Israeli officials like Zissman believe they are "being lost" in their adopted homeland.

True or not, the fact remains that Germany has become a mecca for Jews who have no desire to put up with the hyperinflation, political instability and civil war now ravaging virtually all the former republics of the Soviet empire.

Rabbi's dedication to Torah learning is praised

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —It was supposed to be an evening devoted to shmiras haloshon, guarding one's tongue. And it was, with psychotherapist Phyllis Weinberg, founder of a city-wide campaign against loshon hora (malicious gossip), telling over 100 women at Agudath Israel Synagogue to show concern for family, friends and others in the community.

It was supposed to be a lecture about Rabbi Chaim Shmulewitz, the former head of the Mir yeshiva, whose character, according to his nephew Rabbi Raphael Shmulewitz, epitomized the mitzvah of shmiras haloshon (guarding one's tongue.)

And the younger Rabbi Shmulewitz did speak about his uncle's "great head and great heart," whose brilliance and dedication to Torah learning went hand in hand with compassion, understanding and empathy.

What was not expected was that Weinberg would be presented with the Canada 125 medal, awarded, as MP Joe Volpe explained, by the government of Canada and the Governor General "to recognize the contribution of those working to build a better community."

Weinberg was honored, Volpe explained, for her shmiras haloshon campaign. She was as surprised as everyone else by the presentation.

Rabbi Shmulewitz used anecdotes about Rabbi Chaim Shmulewitz to illustrate the lessons of his life.

Although he was a prominent rosh yeshiva and scholar, he went to the Kotel on the crowded public transport bus, avoiding the pomp (and convenience) he might have been accorded. He considered every second a precious opportunity for Torah study, but every week he took time to visit his old aunt.

He knew the Gemara by heart, but taught with a text in front of him so people wouldn't realize his incredible talent.

He was able to fully share the joy and suffering of others, said Rabbi Shmulewitz. "He cried at the story of Ruth, feeling the shame and humiliation of Ruth and Naomi, and he cried when Ruth was rewarded for her goodness, rejoicing in her joy."

Rabbi Shmulewitz, who lived with Rabbi Chaim for several years, recalled how his uncle used to go the tomb of Absalom before Rosh Hashanah, asking G-d to forgive the Jewish people, just as David forgave his son for rebelling against him.

When a young student could not find a study partner, Rabbi Chaim studied with him himself, thus giving him self-confidence and dignity.

Rabbi Chaim also believed in the importance of showing proper gratitude. He once publicly thanked the cook at a restaurant.

When writing to an elderly relative living in a nursing home, he used his full title, something he rarely did, so staff would perhaps treat him with more respect after seeing him receive mail from a prominent scholar.

He urged everyone to avoid hurting others, even if one thinks it is for their own good, calling it "like putting your hand in a fire — you are bound to get burned yourself."

The lecture was one in a series on the topic of guarding one's tongue. Other projects include telephone stickers, pledges to refrain from gossip at pre-arranged times of the day, and a reminder phone service.

Psalms were recited for Jews in Israel "who are subject to tragic incidents of brutality and murder on a daily basis," said a flyer given out at the program.

MP Joe Volpe congratulates Phyllis Weinberg on her receiving a Canada 125 medal.

Medical ethics to be studied

SAN FRANCISCO — Nearly 400 physicians, nurses, rabbis, and health care professionals from the United States, Canada, Israel and other countries are expected to attend the fifth international conference on Jewish medical ethics, held Feb. 18 to 21, just outside San Francisco.

The conference is sponsored by the Institute for Jewish Medical Ethics of the Hebrew Academy of San Francisco, Stanford University Center for Biomedical Ethics, Asaf Harofeh Hospital in Zerifin, Israel, the Department for Leadership Development and Dor Hemshech of the World Zionist Organization and the National Council of Young Israel.

Lord Immanuel Jakobovits, former chief rabbi of the British Commonwealth and a leading scholar in the field of medical ethics, is taking part in the conference. He described the annual event as "the leading event of its kind in the Jewish world."

Conference topics will include secular as opposed to religious approaches to medical ethics; Maimonides' preventive health care philosophy; use of technology in medicine and science; reproductive problems; justifiable risk in surgery and experimental therapy; and gene therapy.

Some other topics include euthanasia, limitation of health care, and patient rights and physician responsibilities.

The faculty includes Nobel laureates Rosalyn Yalow, Paul Berg and Herbert Abrams; Rabbi Moshe Tendler of Yeshiva University; Mordechai Halperin, Shaarei Zedek Medical Center; nuclear physicist Edward Teller; Fred Rosner, Queen's Hospital Center, Jamaica, N.Y.; David Modai, Asaf Harofeh Medical Center; Martin Greenberg, Children's Hospital, Savannah, Ga.; and Joyce Lashof, dean emeritus of the School of Public Health, University of California at Berkeley.

Also attending will be U.S. Secretary of Health and Human Services Donna Shalala, and Rabbi Pinchas Lipner, founder and dean of the Insitute for Jewish Medical Ethics.

The conference is accredited for nurses and physicians for up to 29 units of continuing medical education by the University of California, San Francisco School of Medicine.

UIA women's campaigns raise over $13 million

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Women's fundraising in federation campaigns has become more and more significant over the years, and last year the 11 women's divisions across the country raised over $13 million, almost 20 per cent of the total amount raised by the United Israel Appeal of Canada, according to Trudy Pekarsky.

Pekarsky, a Vancouver community leader, was recently named president of the Women's Division of UIA of Canada for a two-year term. She will serve also as vice-president of UIA.

As women's earning power has increased in recent years, their pattern of giving has changed drastically, Pekarsky said. They make their own decisions on how much to give and don't necessarily tie in their gifts with what their husbands are contributing. "They are a major force for the good in giving," she added.

Pekarsky said the annual Women's Division conference will be held in April in Ottawa "at which time we hope to motivate and inspire an even greater effort." The theme of the conference will be Campaigning in Peacetime.

Also in the works is a February UIA chairmen's mission to Israel at which time, Pekarsky said, "I hope to get a handle on the peace negotiations and try and determine the course of our campaign planning."

A native of Edmonton, Pekarsky has assumed many leadership positions both in the Women's Division of Vancouver's Combined Jewish Appeal and in the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver. She was chair of the CJA Women's Division in 1985, initiator of the division's Lion of Judah program, first chairman of the Woman to Woman Conversations program in 1993, a member of the JFGV board of directors since 1987 and vice-president of community relations in 1992.

The Woman to Woman Conversations program, launched in 1993, "offered a more personalized approach to women's giving," Pekarsky told The CJN. "Qualitatively, this program was most successful because it gave donors and canvassers alike the opportunity to share their concerns and hopes for our community." The goal for the current campaign of the Women's Division is $1 million.

Meanwhile, the CJA campaign in Vancouver is making good progress, according to Howard Karby, general chair, and Hilary Benson, Women's Division chair. For the first time, the invitation to the Major Donors dinner was extended to spouses and adult children. Said Karby: "Recognizing that the future strength of our community depends on the continuity of familial generosity and commitment, this year's event sought to include major contributors and their families. The evening was extremely successful, with many families represented by two generations."

Israeli national hockey team holds tryouts for tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Israeli national hockey team has held its first series of tryouts in preparation for the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) Pool C, group II competition that is set to face off in Barcelona on March 13.

The team is hoping to improve on its last place finish at the 1993 event in Bled, Slovenia, where it was outclassed by premiere outfits from newly-independent republics like Latvia and Ukraine.

As a result of the one-sided nature of many of the games last year, Pool C has been subdivided into two groups. In '94, Israel will compete against similarly-skilled teams from South Africa, Spain, Belgium, South Korea and Australia, as well as the winner of a tournament between Greece, Turkey and Croatia, and the winner of a second competition between Lithuania and Estonia.

The Israeli contingent figures to be much the same as the one that represented the Jewish state last March, said Gideon Lee, the team's Toronto-based coach. But there could be some surprises. Lev Genin, a former junior A goaltender with Soviet Wings, is a strong candidate to crack the lineup, he said.

Speaking before he left for the tryout camp in Israel, Lee said the team is also looking for North American-based hockey players who hold Israeli passports, who might be interested in playing in the IIHF tournament.

As was the case last year, the national team will hold a pre-tournament training camp at a location north of Barcelona in the weeks leading up to the competition.

Paul Shindman, a Toronto-born oleh who manages the national team, said this year's skaters will be tested for physical fitness prior to their departure for Spain. Last year's team was hampered by the poor conditioning of several of its players, he said.

In other developments, the former Israel Ice Hockey and Figure Skating Association has split into two organizations — one whose mandate is hockey, a second whose mandate is exclusively figure skating. Eric Melanson, a native of Leamington Ontario, who now lives in Kibbutz Naot Mordechai, heads the hockey operations, while Metulla mayor Yossi Goldberg is in charge of figure skating in Israel.

Shindman, who formerly headed the umbrella organization that included both, said that the split occurred because both sports grew large enough to look after their own interests.

Meanwhile, as a result of a successful court challenge, the hockey federation will receive for the first time an allocation from Sports Lotto, Israel's national sports lottery. In previous years, hockey and other sports that were not part of the Israeli athletic mainstream received nothing from the lottery. This year, ice sports will get $100,000.

Most of the money will go to develop youth hockey and purchase equipment for children. Only a portion is earmarked for the national team, Shindman said, adding it is still looking for donations to help offset the costs of icing a team in Barcelona. The national team is still about $20,000 short, he said.

Anyone interested in trying out for the team or in donating equipment (particulary sticks) or money, contact Lee at (416) 512-6660.

MORRIS SEIGEL
GM-Grand Salesmaster

Our strategy for 1994 is to be at least equal or better priced than any broker or leasing company.

There is a misconception that so-called brokers can purchase or lease cars for less than an authorized dealer. Nothing can be further from the truth. And, there is far less hassle involved in establishing warranty registration, service, dependability, etc.

Buying or leasing the Parkwood Price is always the Right Price.

JNF Negev Dinner plans to fete Winnipeg architect

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish National Fund (JNF) Council for Manitoba and Saskatchewan has announced that Morley Blankstein, a prominent Winnipeg architect, is to be the honoree at its 42nd annual Negev Dinner in June.

A lifelong Winnipegger, Blankstein is highly respected for his involvement in the community and his professional accomplishments.

The honoree has been a leader in both the general and Jewish communities in Israel and at home. For many years, he was an active member of the Combined Jewish Appeal of Winnipeg and served as campaign chair in 1978 and 1979. He was also a member of the National Executive Council of the United Israel Appeal of Canada.

Currently, he is a member of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Campus Planning and Building committees, the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue Cemetery committee and its Planning and Development committee and the Canadian Technion Society which he chairs, and the Technion's Board of Governors. He is an Honorary Fellow of the institute.

Former Winnipegger goes from law to compiling elegant recipes

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —How does a real estate developer come to write a cookbook?

Well, says Winnipeg-born Jacqueline Simkin, cooking and entertaining in her Miami home remind her of the warm family holiday gatherings of her childhood.

Her family is well-known in the Winnipeg community. Father Saul Simkin founded BACM Industries, which became part of Genstar. Chair of UJA for a time, a builder of the Rosh Pina Synagogue (her grandfather helped build a Lubavitcher shul in earlier times), he and his brothers were recently honored at the Jewish National Fund's Negev Dinner.

"We were known as a close-knit family. The four brothers were in business together, and they always got along with each other," said Simkin.

That closeness was reflected in family gatherings, where everyone pitched in to provide the food.

"My grandmothers, Rusie Katz and Fanny Simkin, my mother (Claribel) and my aunts (Clara Erlichman and Jen Cohen) were all fabulous cooks. They are my inspiration."

Simkin didn't start out as a expert cook. Instead, she studied law at the University of Manitoba and, later, at King's College at the University of London. When she was first married (she is now divorced) she couldn't cook at all.

But she "loved to eat, so I had to learn how to cook."

She remembers that during an extended stay in Israel, she used to cook American food for her friends. "Nobody ever refused to come. Something like a grilled cheese sandwich was exotic to them."

Jacqueline Simkin

Now, what about that cookbook? It's called Spices, Rices and Other Vices: A Cookbook from Miami and the Beach.

It all started when co-author Beverly Penzell wrote a chapter for an imaginary cookbook as a school project. Penzell had so much fun she decided to work on a real one.

She drew in Simkin, by then a Florida real estate developer, and freelance illustrator Marcia Rabinowitz, and the four-year odyssey to publication began.

Rabinowitz illustrated the book with delightful sketches of food arrangements and laid out the artwork; Simkin did most of the photographs and the writing, and Penzell coordinated the whole project.

Each one took one-third of the recipes and had them tested, Simkin and Rabinowitz by professional chefs. Finally, the book came out, published in the United States by Barricade Books and in Canada by McClelland & Stewart.

The style of the cooking in the book is "elegant and easy," says Simkin. Ingredients found in south Florida markets are utilized, like queso blanco (a salty white cheese) and harina mesa (a form of cornmeal). Cajun and creole seasonings reflect the influence of southern cuisine on Florida cooking, as does the use of native fish, such as snapper and grouper.

"This is an eclectic book," Simkin said. "We tried to incorporate all the cultures of Miami, which is 60 per cent Spanish [along with] English and some Jewish. There is very little Asian influence."

Especially effective are the photographs, which reflect the changing ethnic and architectural face of the area. An elderly woman beams as the camera catches her exercising, rows of snowbirds sit watching the passing scene in Miami, an incredibly beautiful Caribbean woman shows off her native dress.

While the cookbook is not kosher (there are a number of seafood and pork recipes), Simkin says many of the recipes either are acceptable as they are or can be adapted.

In fact, Simkin confided, some of her recipes are not really Miami ones at all — they are transplanted from her North End Winnipeg home.

Russians celebrate Chanukah

TORONTO — About 230 recently arrived Russian immigrants had a taste of Chanukah last month, the first time for many, at National Council of Jewish Women's Council House.

The celebration was co-sponsored by the World Jewry committee and Thornhill Study branch of National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto Section, in association with the Russian Integration Committee of the Jewish Women's Federation of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, and the Community Integration Program of the Jewish Community Centre of Toronto.

The evening began with a greeting from Marsha Slavens, co-chair of the Community Integration program, and a welcome from Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman of the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Toronto. He conducted a beautiful candle lighting ceremony with the assistance of two Russian youths, Susanna Koren and Arkady Barapp.

Culture and history

The children were entertained by the antics of DooDoo the Clown and Wally, and there was lively dancing to the music of Alex Balaganov on the keyboard. Refreshments were served and the children received gift bags filled with chocolate Chanukah gelt, dreidles and coloring books. Special thanks to Shoppers Drug Mart and other companies for the generous donations.

The evening was a tremendous success for participants and volunteers alike. One participant wrote in an ESL class, "I am a newcomer from the former Soviet Union and now we have opportunities to take part in celebrations on the Jewish holidays. It is very important to us because we are Jewish and we want to know our culture and our history."

The Russian Integration committee of Jewish Women's Federation works together with local Jewish organizations to create programs for groups of newly arrived Russians. For further information, contact Vicky Weise at 631-5737.

Analyst outlines student program for Israel activism

By ELIZABETH SUMMERFIELD
Special the The CJN

TORONTO — Jon Rothmann, political analyst and foreign policy consultant, was a keynote speaker and workshop leader at the recent National Convention of the Jewish Students' Network-Canada.

Rothmann, who speaks at campuses across the continent about the Middle East peace process and Jewish identity, listed three levels of conflict: between the superpowers (the United States and the former Soviet Union), between Israel and the Arabs States, and between Israel and the Palestinians.

Rothmann said he has believed for some time that, to achieve peace in the Middle East, all three levels of conflict would have to be resolved.

However now, he said, "The essential element is, that with the collapse of the Soviet Union, the whole matrix has changed. What you have today without the Soviet Union is, on the first level of conflict, no conflict; on the second level of conflict, the hardline Arab States including Syria are being put in a position of having no protector, so they have had to come to the peace table; and on the third level of conflict, it is now the Palestinians who are not only isolated militarily but isolated diplomatically, without any support from a major superpower. So, the collapse of the Soviet Union is, in my judgement, the key catalyst for the entire process."

He then talked about letters exchanged between PLO leader Yasser Arafat and Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin on Sept. 9.

In Arafat's letter, said Rothmann, the PLO leader recognizes Israel's right to exist, unconditionally accepts United Nations resolutions 242 and 338, affirms that the conflict has to be resolved peacefully, renounces terrorism and commits himself to controlling and disciplining those elements within the PLO that might commit terrorist acts. He also acknowledges that the PLO covenant calls for the destruction of Israel, and he indicates that those aspects of the covenant which interfere with the peace process must be abrogated. Rabin's letter acknowledges the PLO as the legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

"So I would suggest that both Israel and the PLO got what they wanted," he concluded. "And that exchange of letters is, to me, the critical basis upon which everything else sits."

Students should go to Israel

Rothmann recommended that students take proactive initiatives on campus. He feels that the level of response is often dictated by the opposition. He sees a need for Jewish students to be able to organize their resources in order to provide accurate information about Israel.

Outlining an agenda for Israel activism on campus, Rothmann suggested three focal points: promote student group trips to Israel; bring cultural programs to campus, such as presentations on Ethiopian Jews in Israel and Israeli archeology; keep students on campus informed of the latest information on the peace process. Cross-Canada speaking tours and film screenings are also effective, he added, and he stressed the importance of openly discussing the difficulties on the road to peace.

Rothmann insisted that Jewish students must go to Israel, and the campuses should encourage them to make their first visit.

Rothmann also discussed the role of the Jewish Students' Network-Canada. He reported that last year, when the National Budgeting Conference for Canadian Jewry held a convention for student leaders, a student in attendance stated that Jewish students are an investment, not an expense. Rothmann said he agrees completely with this statement.

"It is clear that more money is needed for Jewish students. I am a Network partisan. I have seen Network make a difference."

He listed some of the issues that Network has dealt with, such as Jonathan Pollard, Soviet Jewry and Ron Arad.

In Rothmann's view, "Network serves a vital function in Canada. It is the link that unites Jewish students across Canada. The challenge of Network is that it is whatever Jewish students want it to be."

* * *

Specific ways of combating anti-Semitism on campus were addressed in a workshop given by Josh Schwarcz, Ontario director of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, at the Jewish Students' Network-Canada National Convention.

With this in mind, the League has recently published Anti-Semitism on Campus: A Handbook for Student Action as a guide.

Josh Schwarcz

For the past 10 years, the League has been publishing its annual Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents in Canada. The League uses this publication to monitor reported incidents of anti-Semitism in Canada. As a comparison, Schwarcz told his audience, the Toronto Police has only been keeping records of reported hate crimes since last January.

He stated that the League for Human Rights has found a 200 per cent increase in reported anti-Semitic incidents since 1988, and that some of the events have happened on campus. He said that he himself had witnessed bigotry, anti-Zionism, and anti-Semitism on campus during his years as a student.

Schwarcz gave an example of a recent incident at an Ontario university where a swastika was painted in the dormitory of a Jewish student, and a note was left, saying "Jews go home."

He then explained that hate propaganda is illegal under the Criminal Code of Canada and that the League for Human Rights believe that Holocaust denial material is also hate propaganda.

He said that the League does not believe in censorship. They do not want to remove hate propaganda from campus libraries, but they are concerned that hate propaganda could be mislabeled in the history or other sections of a library. The League believes such material should be clearly labelled as Hate Propaganda.

Schwarcz recommended that when students see hate propaganda on campus, they should report it to the Police department, to their local Jewish student group, and to the League for Human Rights, B'nai Brith.

'Michael is with a family at the moment'

There's a strong probability that Michael Benjamin is with a family when another one calls.

Families tell us again and again that our time spent meeting with them is more comforting than sympathy.

For instance, only at Benjamin's is there the opportunity of discussion with a licensed funeral director who is Jewish.

There is a depth of Jewish knowledge to draw upon, and the assurance of personal supervision that leaves no doubt about strict religious observance.

They receive sensitive advice respecting unique family circumstances when they ask about alternatives and express their preferences. They know with confidence that Kovod and dignity will always prevail.

Families recognize that more than a license is needed when there is just one chance to honour the memory of a loved one without incident and according to Jewish custom. For them, the difference at Benjamin's is worth everything.

Baycrest program helps families cope with Alzheimer's

TORONTO — Like many people looking after someone with Alzheimer's Disease, Charles Norman was reluctant to seek outside help when his wife, Jessie, was diagnosed last year.

"I was hesitant at first because I really didn't know what to expect with Alzheimer's," says Norman, a former officer in the British Merchant Marine. "When Jessie was diagnosed, I was told she was going to get worse and worse and I knew I'd have to take over around the house. Since then I've learned to cook, do the laundry, go shopping. I even learned how to bathe Jessie, to shampoo her hair and look after her teeth."

But when his wife's condition began to deteriorate rapidly, Norman knew he needed help. Their family doctor recommended a social worker, who in turn suggested the Samuel Lunenfeld Special Day Care Program offered at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Established in July 1987, the program is designed to provide respite for families caring for older relatives with moderate to severe cognitive impairment due to Alzheimer's disease or other conditions.

The program, which accommodates 60 participants two to three days a week, features escorted, two-way, door-to-door bus transportation, one hot kosher meal daily, and a variety of programs to keep members occupied and help them retain whatever cognitive abilities they still have. Activities include fitness, reminiscence groups, arts and crafts, music, and supervised outings. The program is supervised by a highly trained, dedicated staff consisting of social workers, nurses, a program co-ordinator, five program aides trained in health care, and volunteers.

"We do much more than simply care for the person with Alzheimer's disease," says Diane Phillips, senior social worker at the Special Day Care program. "The families are very keen on it, especially spouses who carry the brunt of care and need respite the most. They really appreciate having those two or three days off, knowing that their relative is safe and well cared for."

Family members are also encouraged to join a seven-week support group where they receive information about cognitive impairment and advice on how to cope with their relative's behavior.

Jessie Norman now attends the Special Day Care Program every Tuesday and Thursday, and her husband treasures the time off.

"It gives me the chance to plan ahead to so some cooking and get things done around the house," he says. "It also gives me a bit of time for myself, which I really missed."

Useful advice

Norman says he's received useful advice from the staff, including tips on how to handle problems that occur when Jessie isn't at Day Care.

"They gave me a lot of confidence to go out and try these things, and they made the situation more clear to me. They even discussed permanent care for her, which I was considering but didn't know which way to go," he adds.

Norman says the caring and supportive environment of Special Day Care impressed him, and he believes his wife really enjoys attending the program.

"Jessie is in such an advanced stage of Alzheimer's that she cannot express herself," he explains. "She can't tell me how good it is or whether she likes it or doesn't like it. But I know she's happy here because of what I observe. When I come to pick her up, she wants to say goodbye to all her friends. I practically have to drag her out of here."

For more information on the Samuel Lunenfeld Special Day Care Service please call Baycrest Centre's Co-ordinated Client Service at 789-5131, ext. 2223.

There's a lot more in being Jewish than you think!

Nobody cares the way you do.

When somebody close to you needs care, nothing can replace the value of your love.

But sometimes, constant attention and calm professional skills are needed as well.

And that's when you should think of Spectrum Health Care.

We've been providing in-home nursing, homemaker, companion, foot care and domestic services to people in Toronto since 1977 – with one simple goal – to make the caregiving experience rewarding for the patient.

That's why we match the skills and personalities of our staff to the physical and emotional needs of our clients.

That's why we assign a supervisor to every client to continually monitor the care being provided.

That's why we're on call 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. And that's why you should call us when you need someone to care.

TAU leaders go to Mexico

TORONTO — Nine leaders of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University participated in the second Hispanic Conference on behalf of the university, held in Mexico City and Cancun.

The Friends of Tel Aviv University in Latin America and Spain event was highlighted by the participation of the President of Mexico, Carlos Salinas de Gortari.

The Canadian delegation included Marcel Adams, chairman of the national board, Montreal president, Sue Carol Isaacson, and Toronto president, Marty Goldberg.

The conference included a series of lectures on current Jewish issues, and a variety of "encounters" between delegates from 74 countries who attended the sessions.

More than two-thirds of the delegates were from Spanish-speaking countries but translation services were provided.

The University was represented by its president, Professor Yoram Dinstein, and the chairman of the board of governors, M. B. Gitten.

The conference theme was a dialogue between the academic world and the community at large and three topics were discussed in depth — new trends in world economy, present-day anti-Semitism and the Middle East peace process.

Regional conferences have been held in Europe and a North American conference is tentatively being planned for Spring 1995.

Seven members of the Canadian delegation to the Second Encounter of Friends of Tel Aviv University in Latin America and Spain, held in Mexico City. The delegates included (from left) Pnina Redler, Arnold and Sue Carol Isaacson, Jeannie Tenenbaum, Marcel and Annie Adams and Deborah White.

Demographic changes pose 'interesting challenge'

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The intermarriage rate in the Toronto Jewish community has doubled from 16 per cent to 32 per cent in the last 10 years, according to a study conducted for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Though this is below the 50 per cent rate in the United States, Jay Brodbar, assistant director of community planning for the Federation, says the two rates are not exactly comparable because the national U.S. rate takes into account many low-concentration Jewish areas while the Toronto experience is more akin to the New York-Baltimore region of heavy Jewish population.

In the 16 per cent of intermarriages in Toronto, one-third of the partners not born Jewish are identifying themselves as Jewish.

Factors such as this suggest that the processes underlying the intermarriage situations should be studied instead of most of the attention being given to the gross numbers, Brodbar said.

Brodbar also found confirmation from recent census data confirming a long-term trend that Jews have a higher proportion of elderly since 15 per cent of the Jewish community is over 65 while the general figure is 10 per cent.

He spoke recently to the Shabbat Study Luncheon of Beth Tzedec Synagogue on the Federation study entitled A First Look. One of its purposes is to give synagogues, social agencies and other groups information to help plan their programs.

The profile of the community was drawn from interviews with a random sample of 1,400 households in the Toronto area, taken as much as possible from areas which together make up an accurate composite picture.

The number of young Jews under 15 is also growing, 21 per cent in 1991, compared with 19 per cent in 1981.

"With a portion of the elderly and the young, both tending to be economically dependent, growing at either end of the age scale, it represents an interesting challenge for the community," Brodbar told The CJN.

The largest number of Jews in Toronto (39 per cent) identify with the Conservative movement, while 24 per cent do so with the Reform movement, and 10 per cent with the Orthodox.

The Conservative figure is about the same as in the U.S. but that of Reform is only half that in U.S., and the Orthodox figure is a little higher than south of the border.

Two-thirds of Toronto's Jews have visited Israel, the study showed, a much higher figure than the comparable one in U.S. More than 90 per cent of teenagers in Toronto have had some form of Jewish education. While a U.S. report showed that 38 per cent of Jews said most of their friends were Jewish, in Toronto 73 per cent said most of their friends were Jewish.

About half of Toronto's Jews belong to a synagogue, which is comparable with the U.S. experience.

Toronto scored better than U.S. cities in its rate of ritual observances, such as maintaining kashruth and lighting Sabbath candles. It also did well in giving money to charity, three-quarters of Toronto Jews reporting contributions to Jewish charities.

There is a dramatic difference in the attitudes to intermarriage, 45 per cent in Toronto being opposed, while in the U.S. only 18 per cent were opposed.

Brodbar believes one of the reasons Toronto has such a good record on charity donation, ritual observance, and Jewish identification generally, is that the Jewish population is still close to the immigrant experience, two-thirds of the adults in the community being immigrants or children of immigrants, which is three or four times higher than in U.S.

"Many of our indicators of Jewish attitude and involvement show some lessening with third and fourth generation Jews; nevertheless there is overall cause for optimism, particularly because even in the fourth generation of Jews in Toronto, there is still a relatively strong connection with our traditions," Brodbar said. "Our goal should be to develop diversity and to think about the quality of our Jewish community life, not only its numbers."

Bequest to Yeshiva U to aid Jewish studies and research

NEW YORK — Yeshiva University is the recipient of a $40 million benefaction — the largest in its 107-year history and believed to be the largest one-time gift to higher education under Jewish auspices — Dr. Norman Lamm, president, announced today.

The announcement of the Rachel Golding Benefaction was made at a recent press conference at the University's Stern College for Women, where Rudolph Giuliani, mayor-elect of New York City, joined Dr. Lamm; David S. Gottesman, the noted investments executive who serves as chairman of the University's Board of Trustees; prominent real estate developers George Klein, a long-time University trustee, and Burton P. Resnick, chair of the Board's Executive committee and of the Board of Overseers of the University's Albert Einstein College of Medicine; and other University leaders.

"I am pleased to be part of this momentous day in the history of Yeshiva University," Mr. Giuliani said. "This bequest, the second largest to a university in New York, is well-deserved and will serve to enhance the ability of Yeshiva University to continue its fine work. Yeshiva University is truly a great institution of higher learning and a place of scholarship our city is proud of."

The benefaction comes from the estate of Mrs. Golding, described by Dr. Lamm and others as a "deeply-observant Jew and financially astute businesswoman" who died December 18, 1992 at the age of 81.

The bequest was made by Mrs. Golding to honor the memory of her late husband Samuel H. Golding, a prominent New York banker and realtor who died in 1970.

Funds from the gift will support a number of projects focusing on Jewish studies and medical research at the University's Joel Jablonski Campus in Manhattan's Washington Heights and the Jack and Pearl Resnick Campus, the Bronx home of the renowned Einstein College of Medicine.

"Rachel Golding was the proverbial 'Woman of Valor'," Dr. Lamm said. "Her visionary generosity will ensure that she and Samuel H. Golding will occupy a place, in perpetuity, at the summit of leadership in the history of educational philanthropy and in the collective memory of our institution and the Jewish people.

"By virtue of its unprecedented breadth and scope," Dr. Lamm said, "the Golding Benefaction will enable us to attain higher levels of accomplishment in every aspect of our unique and vital work, both on behalf of the Jewish community and of society at large here in New York, across the country, and around the world."

In recognition of the legacy, the University will designate seven entities, collectively called the Samuel H. and Rachel Golding Projects: a Centre for Judaic Studies; a Distinguished Scholars Program; an Institute for Biomedical Education; Centres for Molecular Genetics and for Developmental Neurobiology; a Building on the Resnick Campus; and an Endowment for the University's affiliated Rabbi Isaac Eichanan Theological Seminary.

The magnitude of the benefaction is "enormous to an independent institution such as ours," Dr. Lamm said. "Relative to our budget and endowment, it is comparable to a $500 million gift to a Harvard or Yale."

The 107-year-old institution, America's oldest and largest university under Jewish auspices, currently operates under an annual budget of $315 million for its 16 undergraduate, graduate and professional schools and affiliates, which have some 7,000 students at four centres in Manhattan and the Bronx, and affiliated campuses in Los Angeles and Jerusalem. The University's endowment is valued at $293.5 million.

Baycrest emergency plan set to handle disasters

TORONTO — A hurricane swept through Toronto recently, forcing the evacuation of elderly patients and residents from two facilities.

"Fortunately, the disaster only happened on paper," says Patricia Wilson, the emergency measures officer at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care which organized the scenario to test its new emergency plan. "We wanted to see how well we could respond in case a real emergency ever forced other health care facilities to send their clients here," Wilson explains.

Sixty students from the Humber College health sciences division volunteered to act as evacuees for the exercise. They arrived on ambulance buses, complete with realistic medical histories, and were met by a special triage team of Baycrest doctors and nurses who decided how Baycrest could accommodate them. Observers from other health care facilities were on hand to evaluate how well Baycrest staff followed the disaster plan.

"We learned a few things from the exercise which helped us to fine-tune our disaster plan," says Wilson. "But overall, we proved that we can indeed provide a major support to our community if the need arises."

Rabbi Shalomi opens Kolel study week

TORONTO — Rabbi Zalman Schachter Shalomi opens a week of in-depth Judaic study on the theme, Godsearch, on Sunday, Jan. 9, for Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

"Reb Zalman," as he is known, will lead a workshop from 2-5 p.m. at the Zionist Centre, 788 Marlee at Lawrence, to commence Kolel's full week of study on spirituality, the self and faith. He describes the workshop this way: "Through prayer and meditation, movement and song, storytelling, philosophical discourse and text study, we will awaken and inspire the process which connects the individual to the living God. What is prayer all about? What does it accomplish? Then the even weightier questions: Who is God? What is God?"

Rabbi Zalman Schachter

Born in Poland and ordained in 1947 by the Lubavitch Yeshiva of New York, Reb Zalman's special concern is Jewish spiritual renewal. He was Professor of Religion and head of the Department of Near Eastern and Judaic Studies at the University of Manitoba for 20 years. He is currently Professor Emeritus at Temple University in Philadelphia and the Rabbinic chair of ALEPH: Alliance for Jewish Renewal, which he founded as B'nai Or Religious Fellowship in 1962. Rabbi Schachter has published over 150 articles on Jewish spiritual life and is the author of many books, including translations of chassidic and Kabbalistic texts. He has appeared throughout North and South America, Europe and Israel, presenting the central teachings of Chassidism and Kabbalah in a contemporary manner.

Reb Zalman is uniquely cross-denominational in his approach. His interest in the university of spiritual truths has led him to study with Sufi masters, Native American Elders, Catholic monks, Buddhist teachers (including the Dalai Lama), and rabbis of every movement. He received his Doctor of Hebrew Letters from Hebrew Union College, the Reform Jewish seminary, in 1968, and has a broad-based appeal which does not rely on any one affiliation or philosophy.

A mini-course which follows, January 10-13, will explore subjects such as, God and the Problem of Evil, Arguing with God, and A Feminist Response to Traditional Theology. These walk-in classes taught by local Reform Rabbis are $5 at the door with no pre-registration required. Reb Zalman's workshop is $20 by pre-registration, $25 at the door. Childcare is available at $5 per child, by pre-registration only.

Kolel is an adult education centre serving people of university-age and over, regardless of synagogue affiliation or extent of personal observance. Traditional texts are studied from a liberal, egalitarian perspective. To pre-register for the workshop, or to receive the full week's schedule, call 660-3154.

Hate crimes task force rejected by CJC region

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Ontario Liberal Party task force on hate crimes has been criticized even before it has held its first meeting.

"The time for study has passed," said Steven Shulman, associate director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. "What is needed now is action."

Shulman was responding to an announcement by Liberal leader Lyn McLeod that a task force will examine the growing incidence of hate-motivated crimes, compile information about them, canvass the opinions of affected groups and make recommendations on practical steps that might be taken to oppose the worrying trend.

But Shulman said that while Congress hesitates in criticizing anyone who is reacting to hate crimes, "this [issue] has been studied to death. What we need is action."

Shulman said that although the Liberals, Conservatives and New Democrats have all held power in recent years, none has taken sufficient legal action to deal with hatemongers. Government should be more "action-oriented and proactive," he said.

What is needed is "leadership from above to indicate that government sees this as a priority." When police bring hate-promotion cases to the attention of the attorney general, the minister should permit the laying of charges where there are reasonable and probable grounds, Shulman said.

Lyn McLeod

Opposition parties like the Liberals should keep the pressure on government for more anti-hate prosecutions, Shulman added.

Keeping the pressure on government is one of the underlying motivations in creating the task force, said Frank Switzer, a spokesman for the Ontario Liberal caucus. "We feel the need to keep pushing the government to keep [the issue] at the forefront," he said.

Switzer said the proposed task force will differ from previous studies by focusing more on young people and the steps taken by hatemongers to target them for recruitment.

The investigation will also "try to be as practical as can be and come up with some [useful] recommendations," he said.

An expected benefit from the task force's work will be to update the public's knowledge about the extent of the problem, Switzer added.

The task force will be chaired by solicitor general critic Tim Murphy and will included MPPs Elinor Caplan and Alvin Curling. Three open meetings will be held in Toronto to hear presentations from invited members of the public, organizations and law enforcement officials.

The task force will begin consultations in January, and it plans to release its findings and recommendations sometime in February.

Stroke fails to hamper doctor

TORONTO — Before Jack Teichman suffered a stroke four years ago, he was an active swimmer. The 72-year-old retired physician didn't want to give up his leisure activity, so in 1991 he became a member of the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre, a multi-purpose community centre for older adults, which is part of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care in North York.

Not only did Dr. Teichman continue swimming, despite some paralysis on one side of his body, but he has been chosen to receive the Herb Charles Award. According to Diane Cullen, a fitness instructor at the Wagman Centre, this prize is given each year to the swimmer who has improved his or her ability and whose determined, positive outlook is a source of encouragement to others.

Another prize, the Active Living Award, went to Wagman Centre member Peggie Goldsbie. In addition to participating in land fitness, aerobic exercise and aquatics, Goldsbie also volunteered at Baycrest Hospital and sits on the Wagman Centre's Wellness Education Committee. Cullen says that the 73-year old Goldsbie, who can be found in the pool or gym at least four days a week, received the award "because she exemplifies the spirit of active living" which has nothing to do with age.

New Yiddish book out for educators

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In an era when Yiddish is considered by many to be either dead or at death's door, the Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools (JPPS) has done the audacious.

Last June, the schools published a comprehensive resource book for Yiddish educators. It signals that it is not yet time to sit shiva for what was once the lingua franca of Eastern European Jewry.

"Culturally, historically and emotionally, this is important," says JPPS educational director Lucy Cohen. "It is also a realistic project because of the mini-renaissance of Yiddish. There are now faculties of Yiddish at Oxford, Yale, Columbia, and in Israel.

"We think the word will spread."

To be sure, the resource book, called Yiddish: A Lebedikeh Shprach (Yiddish: A Living Language), is the first modern work of its scope. It is long overdue, Cohen said.

Already the first part of the work, in itself over 400 pages long, is used in Jewish elementary schools and is gaining attention in respected Yiddish circles. Some of the 250 copies printed so far have been deposited at the YIVO Institute in New York and other major Yiddish institutions. Two more sections are scheduled for completion in June.

Yiddish uses the most up-to-date, "audio-visual, multi-media" Yiddish teaching techniques, organized around "themes related to a child's environment," said Cohen.

This is because of guiding force and writer Shifra Shtern Krishtalka, a teacher for almost four decades at the Peretz School.

Krishtalka — who is the sister of the late famed Peretz School educator Jacob Zipper and Yiddish poet Sholem Shtern — is 83 years old. But her age belies the intensity and rigor with which she, aided by her son Aaron, has devoted herself to the project.

For Krishtalka, who officially retired in 1976, the project was both rejuvenating and a natural labor of love. In the school's view, it is also a fitting tribute to one of the community's most dedicated and selfless educators.

"First, I had a love for children," Krishtalka said in an interview. "But in teaching, I adapted the European model I had learned at a teacher-training seminar, along the lines Montessori uses today."

That method, which she calls a "whole language approach," was to make the study of Yiddish systematic and "experiential."

Krishtalka made her own audio-visual aids like flash cards at a time when such techniques were unheard of in Montreal. She did away with the phonics approach and encouraged her students to use combinations of letters to form new words — words they could relate to their everyday home life or to the Jewish traditions.

She had her children "sing, dance and jump" to the echoes of Yiddish. She used themes. She brought newspapers into the classroom and constructed scrapbooks, providing "connections between the 'read' word and the 'real' word," she said. "The point was to give the words application."

For Krishtalka, Yiddish was not the goal but a "tool" to foster a love for the language.

The resource book is arranged with this sensibility very much in mind. It combines flexibility and completeness and allows the teacher to borrow freely from it.

In general terms, the work comprises a total lesson plan, encompassing virtually all aspects of Yiddish language instruction along thematic lines: songs, poems, rhymes, games, exercises, crosswords, drawings and discussions connected to the seasons, the Jewish life cycle and traditions, and to Israel.

The first resource book relates mostly to the fall season. The two source books to come, Cohen said, will in effect "complete the school year."

The idea for the project dates back to the late 1970s, when an initiative was taken to divide Yiddish instruction into lesson plans and units, Cohen said.

But the project did not start to take form as until 1989, when discussed among teachers — including Cohen and veteran Montreal educator Nachum Wilchesky — revealed the lack of "up-to-date" Yiddish resource material for instructors.

The project, Cohen said, was also in line with a recommendation made earlier that year at a UNESCO/Hebrew University conference on Yiddish she attended in Jerusalem, to create modern teaching tools for the language.

While plans are to finish the other two sections by June of this year, funding for the project is not complete.

Mixed Emotions a sweet look at love second time around

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Mixed Emotions is a sweet and tender play about people who take a second chance on love.

Herman, a 65-year-old Jewish carpet salesman (Harold Gould) and Christine, a 61-year-old widow (Katherine Helmond) have both lost their spouses. She is Catholic, and her late husband, a Jew, was Herman's best friend, just as she was best friend to Herman's late wife.

Christine is lonely, and plans to sell her New York apartment and move to Florida. Herman is equally lonely, and also sexually frustrated. He aggressively launches a campaign to marry and bed (not necessarily in that order) Christine, a confident and witty interior decorator. They have been sparring with and needling each other for decades. "If we were married, we wouldn't use needles," says Christine, "we'd use knives."

This is the kind of romantic comedy that we saw in the 30's and 40's but now the story centres around the bumpy courtship of 2 sexagenarians.

The underlying theme and recurring topic is sex. When they go out on their first date and he tries to get physical, she exclaims, "Herman I'm a Catholic grandmother; I don't put out on a first date."

When Herman refers to himself as a sexual stallion, Christine opines, "Whatever kind of horse you are, if you're whinnying in my direction, just think of me as the old gray mare."

One of the most effective and touching scenes is when they put on an old big band record and dance cheek-to-cheek and sing to Sentimental Journey and In The Mood for almost 10 minutes, without uttering more than a few sentences. "Know what that song has that today's songs don't have?" asks Herman (referring to Sentimental Journey). "Yes, a melody," answers Christine.

Richard Baer's play has many interesting ingredients. There is conflict. There is the joy of rediscovery and flirtation, and sex after 65. And then there is guilt in betraying a late spouse. In spite of the play's threadbare story line, it is a pleasure to see one with some romance and hope for people over 60, since so many today deal only with the disturbing elements of illness and death.

Harnoy dodges controversy as she builds successful career

By MICHAEL AJZENSTADT
Special to the CJN

JERUSALEM (JPFS) — Controversy seems to follow Ofra Harnoy — the cover girl of the classical music world — wherever she goes.

The last few times the Hadera-born, Toronto-based cellist was in Israel to concertize with smaller orchestras, she was called a deserter by the press.

"I left Israel when I was six, it wasn't fair to treat me like this," says the 28-year-old soloist, who is back to play with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra.

It was this negative treatment from the press, she believes, that caused a postponement of her debut with the IPO until this week.

But, she adds, the "bad feelings are washed away. I want to come here often and play."

Harnoy faced a different type of controversy when she first began to record.

One of her first albums with RCA featured a cover photo of Harnoy and her cello in what was perceived as a somewhat erotic embrace, and her looks have been the highlight of subsequent cover art for her recordings.

While there were very few arguments about Harnoy's beauty, there were those who opposed to using it as a marketing device. "She must be getting away with something beside music," was a common remark, she reminisces.

Harnoy argues emphatically that the fact that her long hair and radiant face are familiar to music lovers worldwide through her 32 recordings, helps the classical music industry as a whole. "People who come to hear me are younger than average concertgoers."

Nor is there any doubt the covers help sales. "There are a lot of CDs out there," Harnoy notes, "and mine are easier to spot."

The cover of her recent recording of three cello concerti, ranging from Boccherini to a premiere by Viotti, features her in black and white instead of the usually color.

Harnoy believes strongly in what she is doing and is frustrated by the negative criticism. "Anytime you make an impact you get enemies," she says, adding that "one or two CDs might have sold because of the cover. After that, I'm sure people bought them because of the music. After all, it's my playing that is really important, the rest is not."

Being back in Israel, even for a short visit, is a delight for the sabra whose family left for Canada when she was a child. "At the time there was an excitement in the air that everything was happening in America. We spent a while in England and eventually moved to Toronto."

But her sweetest memories are still from her Israeli childhood. "Climbing trees in my grandmother's orchard was the best way to have fun. That orchard was like a paradise for me."

It was here that Harnoy began her love affair with the cello. "My mother played the piano and my father the violin and I'm sure they wanted a family trio; they had a strong love for music."

Attended Hebrew school

In Toronto, Harnoy went to Hebrew day school for a few years but when she was accepted as a special music student at the University of Toronto at the age of 13, she concentrated entirely on music. "Everyone else there was in their late teens or early twenties. I had to learn how to prove myself. Being young at university I felt like I was in a minority group."

Harnoy still keeps her home in Toronto, but spends only two months a year there. The rest of time she is on the road. "It's a little too much doing all those yo-yo tours, flying back and forth all over the world. After I return from Israel, I have just two days at home and then I go on a European tour and then on to Asia."

Harnoy is an exclusive RCA artist, meaning that she records only for one label. Even such exclusivity, which has its benefits, is not ironclad, she implies. Harnoy recently recorded an album with Placido Domingo which will soon come out on EMI. Eventually, she explains, "EMI will have to reciprocate the favor to RCA."

At the beginning of her career, Harnoy had to record what the studio asked of her. Later on, as her popularity grew, she was able to make some deals. "I would play what they asked me only if they would let me record a piece I wanted." Now she has much more control over what she records, and she does spend a lot of time in the studio.

"The better you sell, the more input you have. I'm happy right now, I'm doing what I want to do - just too much of it."

Harnoy credits her parents as having the greatest influence on her career. Her mother's "great love for the cello helped me from the beginning. She always gave me the emotional support I needed." Her father, who for two years acted as her personal manager, "always had an input on my career choices."

With such a busy career, Harnoy must make time in order to enjoy some extra-musical activities. "It's important to have a real life. I like hiking and I try to exercise regularly and eat properly except when chocolate urges come." Most important of all is "being around with people who have nothing to do with my profession. This is the only time when I feel like a complete person."

Numbers play key role in Torah study: Plaut

HAIFA, Israel — The Torah, particularly the Book of Genesis, is undergirded by a numbers frame, said Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, longtime rabbi and now scholar-in-residence at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

In a recent lecture at the University of Haifa, Rabbi Plaut, 81, said the ancients may have had a certain sensitivity to numbers that helped them better understand Torah which people today do not possess.

Numbers have served as identifiers from the time of the ancients until today, the rabbi said, citing as examples expressions like "I've got your number," meaning "I understand you," and "his number was up" meaning it was time for that person's numerically identified life to end.

Rabbi Plaut said repetition of some numbers in the Torah, calculations of seasonal cycles and even the ages of biblical figures show that people lived and died in accordance with a divinely calculated scheme.

Since God was the only one who knew someone's inner self, the rabbi continued, the counting of people was reserved to Him. Man, however, knew how to count things like years and goods but was not permitted to count himself.

The Bible recounts three instances when a census was taken. Two were ordered by God (Book of Numbers); but when King David made the mistake of taking a census, a plague resulted. To circumvent the proscriptions and also avoid unfortunate consequences, a tradition arose of using a 10-word sentence to count people or "not number" counting ("not one, not two. . .")

People in those days had a closer link to astronomy and nature, Rabbi Plaut contended. If one didn't know about the moon, stars and planets, or what they represented, one would not know when to plant, reap or sow. One would not be able to survive.

Glaser captures real Jewish family

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Family Secrets is a one-woman play performed by Sherry Glaser, a formidable new talent on the New York theatrical horizon.

Glaser executes a brilliant series of monologues about a dysfunctional middle-class Jewish family (New Yorkers transplanted to the foothills of Los Angeles).

Her disparate gallery of characters includes the father, mother, two daughters and even the grandmother. Besides having the acting versatility to handle these characterizations, Glaser displays genuine devotion to the rhythms of Jewish-oriented humor. Her five portrayals evoke a warm, familiar tone, filled with enough humanity to make us care about what happens to these people.

The father, Mort, is a likeably irascible accountant, somewhat befuddled by the female idiosyncraies around him. Bev is the "perfect mother," who relates the story of her nervous breakdown and how she pulled out of it. Fern, the older sister, settles for out of wedlock motherhood with an out of work Hispanic. The 16-year-old daughter Sandra is a study of adolescent restlessness, constantly resisting the "indignities" heaped on her by her parents. She claims, outrageously, that her life is more difficult than her mother's, since Bev "doesn't do anything" except go to work, cook dinner and attend law school. Lastly there's Rose, Mort's mother, who gives us a touching look at the rediscovery of love in old age.

Glaser is a wondrously alive performer who possesses the interpretive skill to artfully blend whimsical irreverence with heartfelt family feelings. The fresh and original text, (co-authored by Glaser's husband Greg Howells who also directs), is essentially humorous, and although chock-full of one liners, deals with a broad diversity of subjects including: parental failure; homosexuality; abandonment and maladjustment; and frustrated females longing for male attention.

It is overflowing with vivid images and moods, brought to life by an actress, who can alter her posture or even the shape of her face and make it speak volumes about her character.

Appearing for an indefinite run at Westside Theatre, 407 W. 43rd Street.

For tickets call Ticketmaster 212-307-4100.

BILL GLADSTONE'S

EYE ON ARTS

Jewish Music In Toronto is the theme of an unusual collection of 30 photographs that go on display for three weeks beginning Saturday Jan. 8 at the Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., North York. For two years, professional accountant Morris Miller has snapped black and white photographs of musical events in Toronto's Jewish community. His shutter has captured musicians at a UJA walkathon, a war veterans' memorial, a Yiddish concert at Earl Bales Park, a choir festival at Beth Tzedec and other events.

"These photos are not only beautiful to look at, but are something the community should share and take pride in, as they record how we, in various organizations and for a variety of events, express our cultural, traditional and historical heritage through practice," said a spokesperson for the Centre. The show's opening on Jan. 8 at 7.30 p.m. features a concert of Jewish/Yiddish songs and music, with performances by tenor Michael Mandel and The Winchevsky Community Klezmer Orchestra.

In February, Mandel is scheduled to perform in two Toronto Opera Repertoire productions. He sings the lead in Tales of Hoffman and the Duke in Rigoletto.

Artist Cheryl Pagurek has rendered an unusual tribute to her grandparents. She re-created their living room and combined it with a series of photographs that relate to their lives. This "site specific installation and photographic series" is called 5 Fraserwood Ave., Apt.-2. It opens at Hamilton Artists Inc., 248 James St. N., Hamilton, on Jan. 7, and continues to Feb. 12. Call (905) 529-3355 for further information.

Images of Trinity Bellwoods, a photographic exhibit by Tobi Asmoucha, is at the Ryerson Gallery, 80 Spadina Ave., until Jan. 22. The opening reception is Jan. 8 from 1 to 6 p.m.

The CBC has arranged a series of four live Sunday afternoon concerts, performed on period instruments, celebrating the rich musical traditions of Europe. The four concerts focus on Austria, France, Italy & Spain, and Germany.

The series starts with the Austrian concert, in which Jeanne Lamon (violin), Rona Goldensher (violin), Stephen Marvin (viola) and Christina Mahler (cello) play string quartets of Haydn and Mozart. It's on Jan. 23 at 2 p.m. at the Glenn Gould Studio, in the Canadian Broadcasting Centre, 250 Front St. W.

Subsequent concerts are on Feb. 27, March 20 and April 3. Admission is $15, or $52 for the series, with discounts for students and seniors.

The Steven Spielberg film Schindler's List opened on 25 screens across North America in mid-December, and pulled in $600,000 overall in its first weekend, according to Laurie Newman, public relations assistant for Cineplex in Toronto. Although Cineplex doesn't comment on how current films do at the box office, there are reports of line-ups and nearly sold-out houses at the Canada Square location (Yonge and Eglinton), where the three-hour-and-ten-minute-long film opened on two screens.

At the screening I attended, most people didn't rise from their seats until the very end of the credits — seemingly in tribute to what will surely become a screen classic. It's possible that many more people saw the film in a single weekend than all the Holocaust deniers could hope to reach in a lifetime. The film tells the true story of Oskar Schindler, a Czech businessman and Nazi party member who uses his clout as a munitions factory owner to save 1,100 Jews who work for him from being incinerated at Auschwitz. This is an important film to see but Holocaust survivors may find it too difficult to view in a crowded theatre.

Poldek Pfefferberg (Jonathan Sagalle) and his wife Mila (Adi Nitzan) enjoy a rare respite from the misery of life in the ghetto in Schindler's List.

Television show profiles Jewish artist

TORONTO — A Canadian Jewish artist, whose Hungarian parents were saved by Raoul Wallenberg, and an entrepreneurial accountant, whose parents came from Poland, have a lot in common. Through their own artistic courage and colorful view of life, they are both profiles in success.

The artist is Vivian Reiss. The accountant turned television producer is a young Canadian called Andy Zajac, who is not Jewish. On February 26th at 10:30 a.m., Reiss will be featured on Zajac's CHCH-TV series, Profiles in Success.

Reiss's colorful paintings hang in the kaleidoscopic setting of her historic home, once owned by the family of the first premier of Ontario. "An artist can design anything," asserts Reiss.

The committee to celebrate the 200th birthday of Toronto recently commissioned a poster for the special occasion. Reiss, whose home is filled with hundreds of unusually juxtaposed objets d'art (including toy soldiers and lots of other toys that are "my toys"), did a painting of soldiers in Fort York.

In May 1993, to celebrate Canada's birthday she held a vibrant one-woman show at the Fort York Historical Board Museum. She was also honored by Canada's Literacy Secretariat which commissioned a special poster for International Literacy Day. The original now hangs in the Canadian Embassy in Washington.

Zajac is an artist in his own right. He is so creative an accountant that he developed a successful thirteen part T.V. series with no money at all . . . with no contacts except the ones he made. In fact, Profiles of Success (Channel 11) was created entirely on barter. Zajac's cameraman, his assistant, his editor — even his business card so that he could approach people in the first place — were all obtained without any money. At 28, with a lot of youth but little capital, Zajac figured he would swap his accounting services to go into the T.V. business.

He started with sales videos, commercials, and "infomercials." In the process, he became fascinated with the reasons why people are successful, came up with the concept of Profiles of Success, and simply started filming.

The series was sold to CHCH, an independent T.V. station. With celebrated guests like Mitsou, Bob Proctor, the Nylons, Asia (a British band), the Roots Boys, the Ballinger Brothers, Sonja Bata — and, of course, Vivan Reiss — the series was renewed twice. The third segment begins in January.

Now this young Canadian entrepreneur wants a wider audience. He is headed for the NATPE Conference in Florida (ticket obtained by barter) to tackle the international market. He wants a wider audience — an international one.

Reiss has also been branching out. Since 1990, Palm Beach's Jewish Art Foundation has commissioned her to paint the "Spirit of Purim" for each Purim Gala Ball. This past spring, Reiss was exhibited at a gallery on the Rue des Seines in Paris.

Too Big To Fail, Olympia & York: The Story Behind the Headlines, by Walter Stewart (McClelland & Stewart, $29.99.)

Eight centuries ago Maimonides taught that it is in man's nature to strive for riches; but his great desire to increase his wealth and seek honor are the chief sources of his misery. Perhaps the Reichmann Brothers of Toronto should have taken this piece of wisdom to heart.

In 1991, Fortune magazine ranked the Reichmann fortune, estimated at $12.8 billion U.S., as number four on the planet. Renowned for their exploits as developers in Toronto, Calgary and Ottawa, esteemed as the largest private landlords in Manhattan, the Reichmanns were also embarked on gigantic projects in London, Tokyo and San Francisco. They and their flagship company, Olympia and York, were regarded with admiration akin to awe in the business community. As the author suggests, "if you could live in it, work in it, ride on it, heat with it, eat it or drink it, chances were that the O & Y had a piece of it."

But in the early nineties the mighty empire began to crumble. In a few agonizing months the picture abruptly changed. The once proud and seemingly impregnable company stood on the brink of bankruptcy and dissolution.

Walter Stewart is a well-known Canadian editor, author, columnist and freelance journalist. He has written twelve books of non-fiction, chiefly on political, historical and economic subjects. His latest book is an astute, detailed, blow-by-blow account "of how decent men, remarkable builders and outstanding citizens screwed up. And what it means to me and thee."

The book's early chapters deal with the Hungarian origins of the family, their uncertain years in Tangier, the move to Toronto and the success of their burgeoning floor and wall tile company.

Something in the character of the brothers must be attributed to their mother. She was a woman of remarkable energy and courage who, during the war years, helped smuggle Jews out of Nazi occupied countries. At one point, she obtained 1,200 Spanish visas which were used to protect Jews in "safe houses" run by the Red Cross in Budapest.

By the late 1970s most of the Reichmann enterprises, especially buildings in large American cities, were doing well. In one of the rare interviews the brothers gave, Albert — responding to the comment that neither he nor Paul had university educations — said, "When you learn the Talmud you learn everything." Skilfully and absorbingly, the author details the manifold undertakings of the family: their unfortunate entanglement with Robert Campau, their ability to obtain additional funds from the banks even when their position became precarious, their relationship with the Thatcher government, and the Canary Wharf disaster.

The reasons for the downfall were many and varied but foremost among them were the world-wide recession and an overextended magna-empire. Says Stewart, "Paul Reichmann's fatal flaws were excessive belief in his own powers, corporate acquisitiveness, and a penchant for larger and larger gambles. . . . However, he could never have taken his empire to the size it ultimately achieved — and the disaster it ultimately threatened — without the willing co-operation of a mesmerized banking community." All in all, five Canadian banks lent O & Y over three billion dollars."

Today, the brothers have founded a new corporation, have teamed up with George Boros, one of the world's richest men, and have already embarked on major enterprises in Mexico. Left with an estimated $40 million, there is no reason to cry for the Reichmanns. They still have the expertise and aggressiveness to emerge as winners. It is not impossible that one day they may come into possession of Canary Wharf again.

Marked breaks new ground

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A play about psychiatric patients, performed by a professional acting company which includes some psychiatric patients, will attempt to break new ground in Toronto's theatre circuit.

The Friendly Spike Theatre Band, co-directed by Miles Cohen and Ken Innes, is presenting Marked at the Poor Alex Theatre, 296 Brunswick Ave., Jan. 19-29.

Theatregoers are asked to bring food and warm clothes for the Parc Community Center.

Anticipating a 50 per cent cut in psychiatric hospital beds in the next 10 years, Marked deals with the problems of patients living in the community and their need of acceptance by society.

Cohen said the play, running two hours, will include music, songs and interactive videos. "We're not presenting a social documentary, we're presenting true theatre," said Cohen.

One of the segments will deal with the wrongful dismissal of a person with mental illness and an application to the Human Rights Commission to rescind the dismissal.

The ticket price is $10 with pay-what-you-can performances on Tuesday evenings and Sunday matinees. For information call (416) 516-4740.

Mazel Tov is vocal gold

What sweet memories!

What vocalizing!

These are the feelings that Mazel Tov: More Music of the Jewish People, a new cassette, inspire.

Consider the material:

On side one, you'll be swept along by such sentimental favorites as Mein Shtetele Belz and Baigelach.

On side two, you'll be regaled by Shein Vie Die Levoone and When Nathan Was Married To Rose of Washington Square.

This is music that soars and swells. These are songs that are redolent of "the old country" back in Europe.

Sit back and enjoy. Mazel Tov is vocal gold. — S.K.

Musical score compensates for Annie II's weaknesses

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to the CJN

NEW YORK — Annie Warbucks is the musical sequel to the 1977 hit Annie, itself based on the Depression-era comic strip story of Little Orphan Annie.

In Annie Warbucks, the feisty little redhead and her millionaire adoptive father (get a load of this: Daddy Warbuck's 1933 income was $86 million with income taxes of $4,313) are joined on stage by Sandy (canine actor Cindy Lou).

The trio give everything they've got attempting to duplicate the winning formula of the original, but the result is only partially successful. There are a fair number of chuckles, but the storyline by Thomas Meehan is loose and sometimes hard to swallow.

The musical score by a couple of talented Broadway Jewish boys more than compensates for such deficiencies with a dozen lively songs. Martin Charnin (lyrics/director) and Charles Strouse (music) are at the top of their game, and have fashioned a swingtime-flavored score that will set your toes tapping and affix a smile to your lips.

The cast is headed by 9-year-old spitfire Kathryn Zaremba, who plays the title role and belts out songs like a miniature Ethel Merman. Baritone Harvey Presnell is perfectly cast as the cantankerous Daddy. In this sequel, Annie and Daddy Warbucks are in danger of being separated by an evil Commissioner of Child Welfare, who decrees that Daddy cannot adopt Annie unless he finds a wife within 60 days.

Alene Robertson mugs up a storm as the evil commissioner. As the commissioner's daughter, Donna McKechnie dances Peter Gennaro's numbers with all the skill that won her a Tony Award in the original production of A Chorus Line.

Alene Robertson

Marguerite MacIntyre is fetching as Daddy's beautiful and devoted secretary who predictably wins his heart. Ming Cho Lee's scenery is smart, and stylishly showcases the skyline of 1930s Manhattan.

Annie Warbucks was originally destined for Broadway, but it has sensibly been ensconced in a scaled down $1.2-million production (a quarter of Annie's Broadway budget), at the Variety Arts Theatre, a 499-seat off-Broadway house.

Taking a page from the 1930s economy, ticket prices have been scaled down by 40 percent to reach their principal target — the family audience — thereby assuring it of a long a profitable run.

Annie Warbucks is appearing for an indefinite run at Variety Arts Theatre. For tickets call Telecharge (212) 239-6200.

'Scolding' pushes Kaplan to explore Jewish roots

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was a "scolding" from "Mrs.Swadron" an elderly resident of Baycrest in 1977 that inspired a Toronto woman, the great granddaughter of Jacob Gordin, a giant of the Yiddish stage, to learn more about him.

The scolding worked for Beth Kaplan has spent 15 years and nearly all her money researching the amazing life of Jacob Gordin who was known as the "Shakespeare of the Jews."

"Mrs. Swadron saw a story in The CJN about me when I was playing here in Cruel Tears. I mentioned I knew little about my great grandfather," said Kaplan. "She tracked me down and when I went to see her she showed me books by Gordin and scolded me for not knowing his history."

Kaplan related the story recently to a capacity audience of 200 at Earl Bales Park for an evening of drama and comedy by Gordin by the Friends of Yiddish Players directed by Nathan Garnick.

Though she does not speak Yiddish Kaplan promised her audience to take lessons in the language. She has named her first child, Anna, after Gordin's wife, and her son, Samuel Jacob, after the playwright.

She depleted her resources in frequent trips to New York where she was lucky enough to find and interview Helen Zielstein, the 11th and last of Gordin's children born in 1897, and Anna Greenspoon, Gordin's first granddaugter, who was nearly blind and deaf and died a few weeks ago in her 90s. Gordin was 19 and his wife, 13, when they were married in 1872. At age 15, Anna already had two children. When they came to New York they had eight children and eventually they cared for three grandchildren, making a total of 14 in the household.

Gordin made his reputation as a fearless exposer of union corruption, but his work brought him in conflict with Abraham Cahan, editor of the powerful socialist Yiddish newspaper The Forward. Kaplan says it was Cahan's enmity which brought Gordin's work into disfavor before he died.

Kaplan has written a 25-page monograph about Gordin available from the author (972-2722) for $5.

Working without props, or stage settings, Garnick fashioned an enjoyable evening beginning with a comedy sketch about marriage featuring Rose Weisbrot and Ben Clodman. The other comedy sketch aout a young woman determined to refuse the "shidduch"being forced on her by her father, was played by David Newman as the heavy-handed but dramatically perfect father,Blema Steinman as the unwilling daugher and Jack Botwinik as the swain.

It was a scene from Mirelle Effros, a Gordin classic, which revealed why he was revered by the Jewish masses as a playwright who understood the human condition, and who was honored at his death at age 56 in 1909 by the attendance of 250,000 at his funeral.

The play, known as the Jewish Queen Lear, is about a widow who fights to make her own name in the world of business, only to hand her fortune over to her sons, who leave her alone and friendless, to be given a room by a former employee. But Effros comes home for the bar mitzvah of her grandson, and is reunited with her family.

Not all this transpired of course in the one scene played, with Eva Lang as Mirelle, Jeannette Stein as a daughter, Richard Bassett as a son and Hindy Abelson, the grasping daughter-in-law.

Eda Zimler-Schiff, president of Friends of Yiddish, introduced the players.

Great artwork fills the Hermitage

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

ST. PETERSBURG — This historic city on the shores of the Baltic Sea is synonymous with one of the world's greatest museums, the Hermitage.

With its unrivalled collection of paintings, relics and artifacts, it's by far the finest museum in Russia and, perhaps, in all of Europe.

Hard by the Neva River and the fabled Winter Palace of the czars, the Hermitage is physically impressive: gilded drawing rooms and halls, ornate columns, marble floors, sweeping stairways, grand chandeliers and imposing doors.

Within its hushed precincts, visitors find the riches of the ancient Middle East, the treasures of classical Rome and Greece, the handiwork of Russian craftsmen and the artistry of European masters like Michelangelo and Picasso.

I spent two hours here, but merely scratched the surface. Several visits are necessary to take it all in.

I started my tour with a viewing of the Henri Matisee exhibit of still lifes, landscapes, nudes and portraits. It whetted my appetite for more great works of art.

Of course, I was not disappointed.

There were two Leonardos, nine Titians, five Rembrandts, two Raphaels, one Michelangelo plus an assortment of oils by Rubens, El Greco, Renoir, Degas, Monet, Cezanne and Van Gogh.

I feasted my eyes on about 35 Picassos from his pink, blue and cubist periods.

Moving on, I was struck by an unforgettable sight, an elaborate 18th-century carriage with gold and red trim, red silk curtains and cherubic nymphs on its door.

Next, I stood in the throne room of Peter I, the founder of St. Petersburg. A study in crimson velvet and shades of brown hardwood, it bespoke wealth and power.

After a brief rest, during which I tried to digest what I had just seen, I pushed on.

In the intervening hour, I saw coats of arms and heraldic symbols and unsually fine examples of silverware, Flemish tapestries, ceramics, Roman busts and statues, Greek mosaics, and Pharaonic statuary, funeral caskets, jewelry and one shrivelled mummy.

The Hermitage museum in St. Petersburg.

I could have gone on; there was so much more to see. But I was exhausted, and I had an appointment.

Regrettably, I was not lucky enough to revisit the Hermitage, but in the days to come I explored St. Petersburg, which was known as Leningrad during the Communist era.

Criss-crossed by picturesque canals that have fascinated painters for centuries, St. Petersburg was founded in 1703 as Russia's gateway to the West.

As a result, the city is a pleasing blend of Russian and European architecture, with pale pastels being the predominant color of many of its historic buildings.

Unfortunately, the majority of them are in a decrepit state, crumbling monuments of better times.

Nevertheless, St. Petersburg is certainly far more scenic than its rival, Moscow. And two of its brightest jewels are St. Isaac's Cathedral and the Peter-and-Paul fortress.

St. Isaac's, with its 150 murals and marble and jade walls, is a paragon of late Russian classicism.

Damaged by the Nazi siege of 1941-1943, it was lovingly restored after World War II. Its rooftop observatory offers panoramic views of the downtown core. Photography permits are no longer required.

The Peter-and-Paul fortress, with its golden spire piercing the sky, is the oldest surviving building in St. Peterburg. Peter I laid its foundation in 1703.

Initially designed to protect the city from attack, it became a prison in the 18th century. Notable among its captives have been the 19th-century Decembrist rebels, revolutionary Leon Trotsky, novelist Maxim Gorky and, in the early 1940s, Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the present Lubavitch rebbe.

By train, St. Petersburg is an eight-hour overnight journey from Moscow. I flew to Moscow with Lufthansa Airlines via Toronto and Frankfurt. Lufthansa has regularly-scheduled flights to Russia all year round.

Mexico museum considered one of greatest

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MEXICO CITY — There are many marvels in Mexico, a land of proud pyramids and ancient Aztec symbols. But one of this country's greatest wonders is only three decades old and sits in quiet, dignified splendor amid the capital city's general chaos and cacophony.

The National Museum of Anthropology is considered one of the world's great museums — not simply because of the comprehensive scope of its permanent exhibit on central American civilization, but also for its design and sensibility, its esthetic balance of display and its virile bearing.

Located on a plaza of Mexico City's broadest avenue, Paseao de la Reforma, in the first section of Chapultepec Park, the National Museum draws you inside amid a babble of food vendors vying for attention. Mexican families line the walkway and dangle their feet in ponds beside the spacious entranceway.

Once there, you are welcomed by a majestic deity: the enormous monolith of Tlaloc, the Aztec rain god.

Inside the first, "orientation hall," you are welcomed yet again. There is a grand, spacious lobby (the museum was designed by architect Pedro Ramirez Vasquez), dominated by a Rufina Tamayo mural, which provides a range of services, the most noteworthy being a book and crafts store and a sound-and-light show to orient the visitor.

Then, you exit through the lobby's opposite doorway, leading to the main "court."

In fact, this area is actually a huge patio bordered by 12 exhibition halls visitors tour in a counter-clockwise direction.

The most striking aspect of the courtyard is a huge "umbrella" that shelters and shades the patio from the sun. Constructed of concrete and steel, the "umbrella" sits atop an 11-metre column that gushes water over the top and back to the ground, its cascade of droplets playing random patterns on the plaza's basalt rock surface.

The relief art on the column is the work of artist Tomas Chavez Morada, comprised of moulded symbols depicting Mexico's multiracial origins.

Then, there is the exhibit itself: an outstanding archeological survey of Mexico not only in terms of wealth and variety, but exactitude, balance, and revelation.

The first room provides an impressive and suprisingly comprehensive explanation of anthropology and its branches: physical anthropology, archeology, ethnology and linguistics.

The remaining 11 halls on the ground floor peel back layers of primitive, Aztec and Mayan civilizations dating back 170 centuries BCE.

The second, "Meso-American" hall greets the visitor with a mural of ancient central America and a chronological table.

But moving through time, the wonders widen as does the sense of awe. The ubiquitous arrowheads and ceramics, vestiges of the previous civilizations, only hint at what is to come: mammoth and daunting works of stone that pay tribute to the gods and overshadow the sense of self.

The Aztec Hall is the museum's actual centre, both geographical and, in a sense, spiritual, and it envelops and humbles. The pyramid replicas of Teotihuacan, the Toltec warriors, the Tizoc Stone of the greatest Mexican culture, the intricacies of design, come close to overwhelming the senses.

There is a 30-tonne Aztec calendar stone considered even more accurate than European calendars; a copy of Montezuma's headdress; a sculptured jaguar like no other.

The second half of the main floor is, in a sense, a welcome denouement, following a period marked by great artisitic and architectural achievement by several great cultures, according to geography: the Zapotec, Mixtec, Olmecs, Tajins, Totonac, Huastec and Mayan. The architectural style of the Totonac culture in central Veracruz during the Classical and neo-Classical period, with its niches, frets and flying cornices, rivals that of European design during the same period.

On the upper floor, dedicated to "ethnographic displays" depicting dioramic life scenes of the myriad cultures comprising Mexico today, there is greater occasion to linger. The rooms portray life among Mexico's Indian groups who speak 56 languages.

The National Museum of Anthropology is open Tuesdays through Sundays, 9 a.m. to 7 p.m., with free admission on Sundays and holidays and guided tours in English available upon request.

Record year for tourism

JERUSALEM (JPFS) — This year has been the best ever for tourism to Israel, Tourism Minister Uzi Baram told a Tel Aviv press conference.

He said that slightly less than 2 million tourists had visited the country in 1993, an increase of some 10 percent over the previous year.

Each of those tourists spent and average of $1,300 during his stay, Baram added, compared to an average $1,100 in 1992. In comparison, he said, visitors to Greece and Turkey spent about $600 to $700 apiece.

Baram noted that while peace may bring many more tourists, a significant increase in income from tourism will not necessarily follow.

"Until now, we were at the end of the line," Baram said, noting that part of the reason that tourists spent more here than in other countries in the region is that they tend to come to Israel to stay, rather than travel on. With open borders, he said, this could change.

Holocaust learning centre being built for children

NEW JERSEY — The first children's learning centre on the Holocaust is nearing completion in northern Israel.

Yad Layeled is in the final stages of construction at Kibbutz Lohamei Haghetaot near Nahariya. When completed, the three-storey structure will function as a learning museum and memorial to the 1.5 million children killed in the Holocaust.

The kibbutz is also home to The Ghetto Fighters' House, a museum of resistance to the Holocaust.

Yitzhak 'Antek' Zuckerman, a leader of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, first conceived of Yad Layeled.

"Antek originally envisioned a museum where the story of the children would be told. After his death in 1981, the idea was expanded into a living educational memorial for the child," said Ghetto Fighters' House director Monia Avrahami.

Israeli architect Ram Carmi designed the building, which will house a Memorial Hall, an Eternal Flame Hall, the Child in the Holocaust exhibit, and a Janusz Korczak Hall to tell the story of the great educator and martyr. The museum will also house a creative workshop for visiting children.

"We have been dealing with the challenges of Holocaust education since the inception of The Ghetto Fighters' House in 1949," Avrahami said. "This issue of educating children on the subject is one which has been developing gradually. And now the Jewish world is beginning to grapple with it in a serious way.

"We believe that Yad Layeled will make a real contribution to those efforts."

For more information on Yad Layeled, contact The American Friends of The Ghetto Fighters' House, tel. (201) 836-1910, fax (201) 801-0768, address: 765 Queen Anne Rd., Teaneck NJ 07666.

New travel guides

The newest travel guides...

It isn't surprising that northwestern North America is such a popular getaway. Places like Oregon, Washington and British Columbia certainly offer a traveller good value for money, in terms of scenery, accommodation and meals.

So if you're planning a trip out West, consult the 10th edition of Northwest Best Places (Raincoast Books, $24.50). It's comprehensive and readable.

More specifically, Ultimate Washington (Raincoast, $15.50) explains why the Evergreen State, as it is called, is such a favorite destination of adventure seekers and naturalists.

The Visitors' Guide to the Birds of the Rocky Mountain National Parks (Raincoast, $19.95) is obviously aimed at a specific clientele. Still, Roland Wauer's guide may be of use to the general traveller as well.

A companion volume, The Birder's Guide to Bed and Breakfasts (Raincoast, $19.95), provides solid information on where to go and where to stay.

After Florida and California, Arizona is probably the third most visited snow bird state. Apart from its dry, temperate winter climate, Arizona conjures up desert resorts, mountain retreats and uncrowded parks. Read all about it in Ultimate Arizona (Raincoast, $15.50).

Travel is not just for the younger set, as Isobel Warren's book, On the Go at 50 Plus (Cedar Cave Publishing, $12.95), points out.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Kudos to Canadian Pacific Hotels & Resorts for being a corporation with a heart. During November and December, CP provided complimentary accommodations for needy out-of-town families visiting hospitalized relatives in major cities across Canada.

Some families also received a brief respite from their hospital duty when offered a stay at rural resorts like Chateau Whistler, Chateau Lake Louise and Chateau Montebello.

"It's one small way we can help ease the emotional and financial burdens that accompany family illness and hospitalization," said CPH&R president Robert DeMone.

Famous for its landmark heritage hotels across Canada, CP was the first to pursue hotel environmentalism here in a big way. At one time, 500 used bars of soap were thrown out daily from the Banff Springs Hotel alone. Now, used soap from all CP hotels is collected, recycled, and given to charities locally and in the Third World. Hotels have reduced paper and energy consumption, established connections with food banks, even introduced blue recycling boxes for guests.

"We have a lot in common with environmentalists, as many of our hotels are in areas of pristine beauty," says CPH&R spokesperson Anne Checkley. "People do not come to see our hotels — they come to see the lakes and scenery."

CP properties in Victoria, Banff, Lake Louise, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec City and other cities were originally built as luxurious way-stations along the newly-completed trans-Canada railroad.

"If we can't export the scenery, we'll import the tourists," was the philosophy of William Cornelius Van Horne, the railway baron who built this Canadian ocean-to-ocean chain of landmark hotels. As Van Horne undoubtedly understood, scenery (or a great urban location) is one of three things shared by grand hotels; the other two are architectural magnificence and a reputation for excellence.

In the Maritimes, the Algonquin is a 105-year-old Tudor-style seaside resort on the Bay of Fundy, open mid-May to mid-October. Situated in St. Andrews-by-the-Sea, N.B., it offers old-fashioned elegance, great golfing, and proximity to whale-watching cruises in Passamaquoddy Bay.

Canada's railway hotels were instrumental in establishing a national architectural motif that combines sweeping grandness with European elegance. Quebec City's famous Chateau Frontenac, fashioned after a 17th-century Loire chateau, has become an inseparable element of the historic cityscape. Likewise Ottawa's Chateau Laurier, whose Gothic styling bears much in common with the neighbouring Parliament Buildings.

Set in exquisite mountain settings, CP's two main Rocky Mountain holdings are unique resorts known around the world. In style, they are simultaneously thoroughly Canadian and thoroughly imitative of Europe. A Scottish baronial castle was the model for the Banff Springs Hotel, just as a chalet in the Swiss Alps was the template for Chateau Lake Louise. Each has immense character, and each is the epitome of a grand hotel.

On the Pacific coast, the elegant Empress Hotel, set on Victoria's inner harbour, reflects the British character of the English-Canadian establishment. High tea has become a tradition here, served each afternoon in the elegant Palm Court. Whistler, B.C.'s highly popular ski resort, is another legendary Canadian Pacific property.

CP's urban properties are somewhat less elegant. But the Royal York in Toronto, the Palliser in Calgary and the Hotel Vancouver still possess the old-fashioned stateliness and green copper roofs of yesteryear. Like their more glorious counterparts, they have benefited extensively from the $600 million that CP has poured into restorations since the mid-1980s.

As a dramatic contrast, consider two of CP's modern buildings. The SkyDome Hotel was built into the north wall of Toronto's SkyDome stadium. Its 70 rooms that overlook the playing field are much in demand during World Series championships. Naturally, this type of architectural showmanship reflects the 1980s rather than the 1880s, when the groundwork was laid on the earliest of Canada's railway hotels.

Just two years old, Vancouver's Waterfront Centre Hotel features 489 guest rooms and suites, more than half with harbour or mountain views. Towering over the water, the hotel is attractive and spacious, and offers a high level of service. Perhaps all it needs is longevity to attain the sterling reputation of its neighbour, the Pan Pacific, which Conde Nast Traveler Magazine included last year in a list of readers' 25 favourite hotels outside the United States.

In recent years, with more and more passenger vessels being built, the cruise industry has become, subject to fierce competition and substantial ticket discounts. With today's sluggish economy, this may not be the right time to launch a new luxury cruise-ship venture.

However, Toronto travel entrepreneur Sam Blythe did not succeed in business by following the prevailing winds. His innovative firm, Blythe & Company, has become well-known for offering unique and exciting adventure packages.

Last month Blythe established Marine Expeditions, a company that is offering sea voyages to exotic places, beginning next July. Destinations include Antarctica, Norway, Greenland, Iceland, Labrador and the European and North American arctics.

Marine Expeditions also expects to put cruise ships back on the Great Lakes for the first time in 20 years. Cruises (either 8 or 10 days long) begin in Toronto and will sail on four of the five Great Lakes (Ontario, Erie, Huron and Superior).

Points of interest include Niagara Falls, Niagara-on-the-Lake, Point Pelee, Tobermory, Flowerpot Island, the Thirty Thousand Islands, Sault Ste. Marie, and an optional trip to the spectacular Agawa Canyon via the Algoma Central Railway. The tour finishes in Duluth, and passengers fly back to Toronto. Prices begin at $1,295 and rise steeply.

About three years ago, Blythe & Company announced it was restoring the "Royal Canadian" luxury train service from Toronto to Vancouver. Alas, the market was apparently not strong enough and the service was indefinitely postponed. Here's hoping people salute this new idea that Blythe is raising to the top of the mast.

Shoppers Drug Mart

Murray Koffler

Forty-seven years after graduating from the Ontario College of Pharmacy, Murray Koffler retains a youthful enthusiasm for the profession he reluctantly entered as a young man. He is known for having introduced numerous changes to the practice of pharmacy as founder of Shoppers Drug Mart, a Canada-wide chain which has grown over the past three decades to include some 700 stores.

On Jan. 9 Koffler will be honored by the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science on the occasion of his 70th birthday, as he steps down after six years as chair of the university's international board of governors. Koffler founded the Canadian Society in 1965.

Koffler's interests also led him to found the Canadian Council for Native Business, Operation Lifeline (a volunteer organization to settle Boat People from Southeast Asia), the Koffler Centre of the Arts, the Foundation for Ecological Action in Israel, the Council on Drug Abuse and the Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition. He sits on over a dozen boards of directors, among them The Canadian Jewish News, Mount Sinai Hospital, the Jewish Community Centre and World Wildlife Federation.

A co-founder and director of Four Seasons Hotels Limited, Koffler was also co-founder in 1986 of King Ranch Health Spa and Fitness Resort, a luxury spa that struggled unsuccessfully to survive the recession.

He and his wife Marvelle have five grown children. Koffler spoke with CJN reporter Frances Kraft recently at his Toronto home.

CJN: What prompted your innovations to the pharmacy business?

Koffler: My father died when I was 17, and I was left with two drugstores. I worked in [the stores] until I was 21, just getting to understand the business.

[In the morning] we used to have a storeful of people ordering bacon and eggs, and I was behind the soda fountain cleaning dishes. This didn't look like a career that I was too excited about.

My mother encouraged me to get my degree and stay with pharmacy. In the interim we had to give up one store, just to keep our heads above water.

When I graduated, the first thing I did was to throw out the soda fountain and move the dispensary right up into the window, which increased our prescription business by threefold.

Then I said, "If [supermarkets] have self-serve, why can't a drugstore?" So I brought in supermarket fixtures. Everybody thought I was mad.

Then we stopped delivery, except for emergencies. We'd had 12 kids on bicycles running around and not making any money [for the store]. People had to come to the store to get their merchandise, and behold, our business went up again.

Necessity is the mother of invention. I just didn't like the way it was going. I said, "Okay, we'll change it." I had a lot of resistance, [but the store] became quite successful.

Then an opportunity arose [in] a shopping centre. When I was opening that store, I had to worry about the first store on Bathurst Street.

I came up with an idea [which] is now known as the associate system, where I gave the store manager the opportunity to run that store as his business. I just got a percentage of the volume.

That worked so well that when an opportunity came up to open a [third] store, I gave the [second] store over to an associate. That just parlayed, until we got up to about 17 stores. I opened each store and then handed it over.

CJN: How does your associate system differ from a franchise?

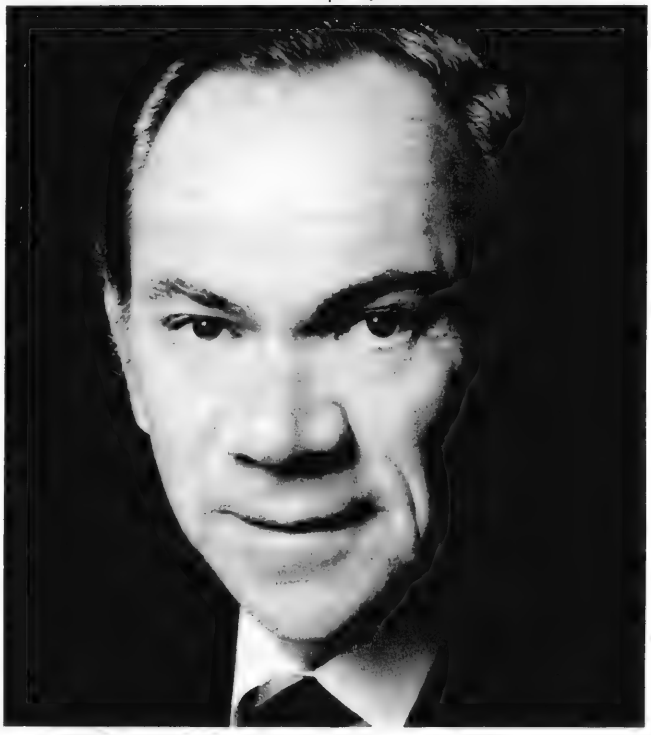
Koffler: No pharmacist has to come up with any money, and he doesn't buy from the company. In our system the company — and it used to be me the individual — gets the store operating and then hands it over. You [the pharmacist] pay all the expenses and manage the business and the staff and then pay [the company] a percentage of the business you do.



You have no debt. All of a sudden you're going to do a million dollars worth of business. You have a guaranteed salary. Everything over and above that [after operating expenses], you keep, and we'll get two per cent or five per cent of the volume — every [store] is structured differently.

The pharmacist at the store level buys in cooperation with all the other pharmacists. Revlon, for example, gives our 700 stores a much better price than they would give one pharmacist.

CJN: Who gets the new stores off the ground now?

Koffler: Our real estate department structures the lease, then our store planning department goes in and fixtures the store, then our merchandising crew goes in and puts in the merchandise. Then we pick a pharmacist who has come through the [Shoppers] system and been to the Koffler Academy, a training school where our pharmacists learn to be managers. Then by contractual arrangement we hand the business over.

CJN: Does the Koffler Academy have anything to do with the Koffler Institute for Pharmacy Management at the University of Toronto?

Koffler: No. It's only for Shoppers Drug Mart pharmacists.

I built The Koffler Institute later, because I felt everyone should have that benefit.

CJN: Is there anything you would have done differently at Shoppers, from a business point of view?

Koffler: No, I think it's just gone so well. One [thing which] has paid off was my faith that the next person could do the job as well as me, and often better.

[That] whole concept goes right through the company, up to top management. Everything is done by consensus. We always get input from people, and it's really the most democratic form of business.

CJN: What do you think it was that enabled you to recognize opportunities and take advantage of them at the right time?

Koffler: Happenstance. I just think these things come along.

For instance, my wife and I were in New York at the Washington Square art show, and when we came back to Toronto our police were kicking a couple of artists off the City Hall stairs. I said, "We ought to have an art show." So I started an art show.

CJN: You've given your time and money to many causes. How do you determine which ones merit your attention?

Koffler: There are many important situations that need public involvement. People are attracted to things that just trigger their emotion, I guess.

I'll give you an example. I was in Calgary with Marvelle when we were building the Four Seasons Calgary Hotel. We went into the construction site, and there was a whole family of native people huddling in the damp basement.

From there I went to visit one of the Shoppers Drug Mart stores, and as we walked in, a couple of [native] men were being hustled out because they had stolen some Jergen's lotion, [which] has an alcohol base.

I came back and gathered a group of business people and native people, and we started the Canadian Council for Native Business. We've employed, or we've created jobs as interns, for 1,200 native people, I think the last count is, who are now well placed in industries.

Everything that I've been involved in has a sort of spark that says, "Do something. Get involved."

CJN: What was it about Weizmann that prompted you to take such an active role?

Koffler: Several compelling reasons. As I got to understand the Weizmann Institute, I felt it wasn't an institution in Israel just for Israel and Israelis and for Jews. It was really a great contribution to the world, to humanity.

CJN: How did you get involved in doing business in Israel?

Koffler: The Four Seasons [Hotel in Netanya] came out of the first economic conference that was structured in 1966 by Prime Minister [Levi] Eshkol and Finance Minister [Pinchas] Sapir. The whole idea was how to get more tourists to Israel.

At the next economic conference, the concept was bring us your know-how, bring us your investment, come to Israel and do business. I led the Canadian contingent to that conference.

While I was there, I met a local pharmacist who was ready come to America to make his fortune. I said, "Don't leave. I'll finance you and give you our system, and you can build a typical Shoppers Drug Mart in Israel." It was so successful that people were lined up to get in.

That begat another one, and it got up to about five stores. My son Leon, who was with Shoppers Drug Mart at the time, went over, and then his sister Theo followed him, and together they built a few more stores. Today there are 32 stores open. It's just a model of a business, with six more opening in 1994, to make 38 stores.

CJN: What would you tell Canadians who are thinking of doing business in Israel?

Lufthansa targets former Soviet Union

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Business travellers in search of new opportunities in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union are discovering Lufthansa has more flights to these destinations than any other airline.

The first and still the only Western airline flying to Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, Lufthansa currently offers 250 flights per week to the former Soviet republics.

Of these flights, 116 originate in Frankfurt, the crossroads of continental European aviation. Last year, 30 million passengers passed through Frankfurt.

Lufthansa flights also take off from Munich, Berlin, Dusseldorf, Hamburg, Stuttgart and Leipzig.

Canadians flying to Eastern Europe and the old Soviet Union with Lufthansa begin their trip in Toronto or Montreal and catch a connecting flight in one of the aforementioned cities.

Apart from Almaty and Tashkent, Lufthasa flies to the following places:

Bucharest, Budapest, Katowice, Kiev, Minsk, Moscow, Prague, Riga, St. Petersburg, Sofia, Tallin, Vilnius, Warsaw and Zagreb.

Moscow tops the list, with 21 weekly flights from seven cities in Germany, followed by Prague, Budapest and Warsaw.

Lufthansa's service to Eastern Europe was inaugurated with flights to Prague in April 1966.

Lufthansa flies to 222 cities around the world.

Its most recent destinations, Katowice, Tashkent and Almaty, were added in 1993.

With the recent additions, Lufthansa flies to 222 cities around the world, more than any other airline.

Lufthansa's service to Israel marked its 25th anniversary in 1993. It was the first foreign airline to resume flights to Ben-Gurion Airport after the 1991 Gulf War.

Upon request, kosher meals are available, though they should be ordered when flights are booked.

* * *

Further information can be obtained from Lufthansa in Toronto and Montreal

Koffler: The most important thing would be either to have a solid working relationship with an Israeli in whom you have confidence and who has the managerial qualifications to be part of the business, or to send someone there from here, as we did. You cannot just send money and expect someone else to run your business, unless you're going to be closely involved.

CJN: What are the barriers to be overcome?

Koffler: Language is not a barrier because everybody in business speaks English to a degree. Cultural differences are considerable [but] not a problem if you're flexible. My son loves it. There is a need to adjust, on both sides, but the opportunities in Israel are tremendous.

As a matter of fact, anyone who looks to getting involved [in business] in Canada today looks at a fairly difficult picture. I won't call it bleak, but it's certainly not a gung-ho atmosphere of business opportunity.

On the other hand, if you want to do business in Israel, there's terrific opportunity. Very bullish economy.

CJN: Any predictions about how the peace accord will affect business?

Koffler: I think it will enhance business. It already has.

CJN: You were quoted in your biography (Just a Simple Pharmacist, by the late Frank Rasky) as saying that your lack of formal business training was probably an asset. What advice would you give to business students today?

Koffler: I said that, I think, with tongue in cheek, but I did have a lack of business training and it's a real miss. The '70s and '80s were a very opportunistic, affluent era, [but] things are a little tougher now. The more business education you have [the better] in this age of information and computers.

CJN: Do you think pharmacy is still a good profession to go into?

Koffler: It's a marvellous profession. If it's run right, it's a terrific business. You're selling products that people need. Terrific opportunity.

CJN: What do you think the government's role should be in legislation regarding pharmacy?

Koffler: You have to have government legislation. You have to control the kinds of drugs that can be sold with and without a prescription. You have to have the government involved because they're providing the [health insurance], but there should be a line where [pharmacists have] to be responsible to carry on their business without negative "interference" from the government.

CJN: Has there ever been a conflict of interest between Shoppers Drug Mart and its holding company, Imasco Ltd.?

Koffler: NEVER. Imasco's never involved themselves in our marketing procedures. We don't get any better prices from Imasco for Player's than we do for other cigarettes. Imasco and Imperial [Tobacco] have rolled over backwards to try to prove that Shoppers is not a privileged buyer.

CJN: Is there a conflict from the point of view of pharmacists being in the business of promoting healthier lifestyles, while Imasco produces cigarettes, which are known to be detrimental to health?

Koffler: It's not a conflict of interest. As long as tobacco is legal and as long as the public wants it, pharmacists should be in a position to deal on a fair playing field. That is not the way it is shaping up.

The latest example [of government interference] is [the Ontario government's proposed tobacco control legislation]. It is inconceivable that there could be a discriminatory piece of legislation where one type of business can sell tobacco and next door a pharmacy cannot. I would hope that the due process would negate that piece of legislation.

Shoppers will manage. It's the independent pharmacists who are having a difficult time. I'm concerned for — and I mean it sincerely — the independent pharmacist who needs every product possible to draw customers into his store.

Food stores now have a complete drug department. What [is government] going to do about the supermarkets?

CJN: Do you have any regrets about King Ranch?

Koffler: None whatsoever. King Ranch opened at the start of the recession, and the economy went into a tailspin. It was an outstanding facility, but on some days we'd have 30 guests and 150 staff. We subsidized it for a full year, then sold it. It was a wonderful idea that was hit by unusual economic circumstances.

CJN: Are you optimistic about Canada's economic picture now?

Koffler: I think the economics are picking up. I'm definitely positive, [but] Canada's taken a tremendous shellacking. I think it'll take a little while.

Toronto Judaica collector displays his wares at the Beth Sholom

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The refined calm of antique dealer Morry Rotman's showroom is shattered by the arrival of a decorator and her client.

"I just love this fabric with these chairs," shrieks the decorator. "You have to have them for your living room."

Her young client, dressed like a rock star in head-to-toe black, doesn't look convinced.

Rotman repositions the furniture and obligingly holds up swatches of material before discreetly slipping away to let the decorator make the sale.

He shakes his head. "When customers talk about the size and color instead of the craftsmanship, I have to walk away."

Rotman, 64, is passionate about the antiques he has been selling for 37 years. His 6,000-sq. ft. showroom in downtown Toronto is testimony to that passion. Inside the drab-looking industrial building at King and Sherbourne street, the vast ceiling drips with chandeliers; gilded sconces are mounted on partitioned walls. The 19th-century French furniture sits atop Persian rugs. Every piece has been chosen for its beauty and workmanship.

He is also selective of his clientele. Rotman does not sell to the public. His showroom is open, by appointment only, to decorators and those recommended by long-standing customers. The woman in black is the daughter of one of them. She eventually buys two Louis XV-style armchairs for $2,000 apiece.

Sitting cross-legged on those same chairs earlier in the day, Rotman is as elegant as his surroundings. However, his sleeves will be rolled up by 2:30 p.m. when he goes home, as he has done every day for 15 years, to have tea with his wife, Kay. She is his other passion in life.

"A girl I knew showed me a picture of this girl sitting on a rock in Wasaga Beach. I told her I wanted to meet her friend, Katie Nixzel. She was 14 at the time," Rotman says. "I still have that picture."

There are more recent pictures of Kay, a youthful-looking woman, scattered throughout the showroom. Rotman calls her "my sweetheart" and "my passion flower." Together they have travelled the world looking for antiques.

"Our business is our pleasure," Rotman says. "Everywhere we go we meet nice people and sometimes we do a little business."

Rotman is no stranger to business. He started making money when he was 10 by bagging groceries at a family friend's fruit stand in Kensington Market. He then quit school at 14 to help support his family, earning $12 a week as an apprentice at Standard Upholstery.

Rotman was born in Toronto, the third of six boys. His partents emigrated from Poland after World War I and settled near Dundas and Bathurst streets. Many Jews, like the Rotmans, lived in the area and worked in the nearby garment factories. Rotman's father was a coatmaker; his mother kept their home.

Rotman and Kay eloped when he was 17 and she 16. They lived with her family for three years and with the savings Rotman opened an interior decorating store on Eglinton Avenue West. His training was on-the-job. "I learned to make drapes very quickly," he says.

It was around that time, in the early '50s, that Rotman began buying antiques as a hobby. He would go to the Salvation Army store at Richmond Street and Spadina Avenue and pick out what he liked.

"I'd buy what we could afford, which wasn't very much at that time, and take it home to my basement." He would resell the untouched pieces to friends. Within four years he opened his own antiques store.

Rotman attributes his love of antiques to his mother, who bought porcelain figurings and antique-style furniture in Kensington Market with the little money she had. Like her, Rotman says his taste is innate. "She never went to museums in Poland. No one had any money there."

Rotman's clientele has no such problems. His antiques can be found in homes and businesses in Montreal, Hamilton, New York and Florida. "I don't lose too many clients because of price."

His pieces can also be seen in big-budget commercials and movies like The Ref, Married To It and the upcoming Canadian Bacon, starring Alan Alda, John Candy and Rhea Perlman. Rotman began renting antiques 17 years ago to a CBC documentary crew. He says the money it brings in accounts for only 10 to 20 per cent of his income, but "I get a kick out of it."

* * *

Rotman relaxes with a cup of tea. The chandeliers tinkle periodically as the photographer who rents space upstairs rolls his equipment across the floor. Rotman has owned the building since 1976, filling it with objects like an entire panelled room rescued from a demolished department store.

He points to a Louis XVI-style cabinet with marquetry inlays and gilt mouldings. It dates from around 1850. "It took me two days to clean [the mouldings] by hand. I really admire the time people put into making these pieces. They're works of art."

Antiques dealer and Judaica collector Morry Rotman poses in his Toronto showroom with some of his pieces.

Not only does Rotman admire the pieces, he strives to know their stories. He relaxes by reading art books and Sotheby's catalogues. His knowledge has often given him the advantage in making a deal. He chuckles while relating one such story.

"I found a spice box [used for Havdallah services] in a Florida flea market. The guy selling it thought it was an inkwell. I bought it for $90. It was made in Turkey around 1875 of silver and silver gilt. It's worth over $2,000."

The Rotmans have been collecting Judaica for over 10 years. They have amassed close to 300 spice boxes, candlesticks, Torah pointers and the like from around the world. A portion of the Kay and Morry Rotman Collection — 63 pieces — will be displayed indefinitely at Beth Sholom Synagogue, where they have been members for over 40 years.

Among the more unusual pieces displayed at the synagogue are a German spice holder made around 1740 in the shape of a woman; a Dutch spice holder circa 1900 in the shape of a windmill; and a turn-of-the-century Viennese gilt table clock with Hebrew letters on the face. Other pieces come from Morocco, Syria, Turkey and Yemen as well as central and Eastern Europe. None of them are for sale.

Rotman pursues antiques and Judaica single-mindedly. He admits he has lost sleep over some pieces. He once had the chance to buy the third draft of Napoleon's surrender, written in his own hand from the island of Elba, from the Cuban government for $10,000. It's now worth $500,000. He regrets not making the deal when he had his chance. "I asked them to sell it later, but it had been declared a national treasure and put into a Cuban museum."

Among his own treasures Rotman counts his two daughters and four grandchildren. They see each other at least once a week when Kay makes Friday night dinner.

Rotman says no one from the family has shown interest in taking over his business, but he has no plans to retire.

"They'll have to carry me out in a box."

Big Bird's creators still shining after quarter of a century

By RUTH BIGUS
Special to The CJN

What would your workplace be like if your co-workers were none other than Big Bird, The Count, Oscar the Grouch and an assortment of other Muppets?

It would probably be entertaining and fun — and popular with the preschool set. Such is the scenario for four Jewish members of the creative team of public television's award-winning series Sesame Street, which is currently celebrating its 25 birthday. The program is the product of the Children's Television Workshop, in New York City.

Michael Loman joined Sesame Street a year ago as executive producer. A native New Yorker, Loman has had a varied career in the entertainment field. He began as an actor and singer in the Big Apple. Loman went on to Hollywood, spending 17 years as an independent television producer and writer. His many credits include working as a writer/co-producer for The Cosby Show, for which he won an Emmy.

In addition to his work in the entertainment field, Loman also taught language arts and reading for five years at the junior high school level.

What made Loman decide to leave the glamor of Hollywood for life on "the Street?"

"When the job became available it just brought all the aspects of my background together," Loman said. "I thought it would allow me to make a really important contribution, too."

In his capacity as executive producer Loman is responsible for the overall concept and creative direction of the series, which features 110 new shows a season. He works with the show's producers, writers, directors and other staff.

"What I really didn't know at first is that everything is written to a curriculum. Now, it may be masked in an entertaining format. . . . There is a fine line between teaching something and just entertaining," he said.

Loman said Sesame Street's mission has not changed in the 25 years it has been on the air; its goal is to educate children in an entertaining manner.

"We try to show all kinds of kids on the show," he said. "We want to give children a positive sense of who they are, make sure that they see all ethnic and racial groups represented."

Loman made the point that the show is not written just for children.

"We program specifically for adults to watch with the children. Research indicates children learn more when they can interact with adults about what they are seeing," Loman said.

Loman said his own Jewish background has helped him with his work on Sesame Street.

"In terms of my own family, the Jewish people I have been around were involved in civil rights and seeing all kinds of people in the same light," he said. "My father said, 'Respect the rights of others.' So it is extremely important to me to let children see that 'different' is not frightening. It is important for them to know that others have feelings too."

For more than 20 years, Norman Stiles has called Sesame Street home. As head writer for the series, Stiles leads a team of more than 20 writers, who develop each show based on the set curriculum.

"I see myself as a head coach," said Stiles, who grew up in the Washington Heights area of New York in a predominately Jewish neighborhood.

An assignment is given out to an individual member of the team, who writes the script for each show, covering the curriculum supplied. Then Stiles reviews the script with the writer, it is revised and then sent on to the research department for approval.

"I try to get all these characters to speak with the same voice no matter who is writing for them — so that they meet the vision of the show," Stiles said.

Like Loman, Stiles brings impressive credentials to Sesame Street. He served as a staff writer for the Merv Griffin Show and went on to co-create the television series When Things Were Rotten with Mel Brooks. He later worked on a number of television series, including Fernwood Tonight.

Stiles likes the collaborative working environment of Sesame Street.

"Nobody can say, 'That is my character,' but you might be able to claim that you conceived of a character," he said.

Stiles said it is tough at times to meet the curriculum needs of the program.

"The challenge is precisely to do a show that teaches and entertains at the same time — to meet the needs of our target audience."

As with Loman, Stiles, too, sees some aspects of his Jewish upbringing affecting his work on Sesame Street.

"I grew up in a Jewish liberal tradition. The messages I was getting had to do with people being treated fairly, and we emphasize just that on Sesame Street."

Lisa Simon is the Sesame Street veteran of the Jewish quartet. Today Simon is the supervising producer/director of Sesame Street, and she has won seven Emmys for her work on the program. Simon never dreamed she would be with the program so long when she came aboard in 1969 as a student at Humber College.

"It's just amazing to me (that it has been 25 years). Time goes very quickly. . . . I don't look back, I look forward," she said.

Simon, a native of Detroit, climbed the ranks from production assistant to her current position.

During her years on "the Street," Simon directed a pilot for Shalom Sesame, the Hebrew-language version of Sesame Street. Shalom Sesame was designed to help children learn about Israeli culture, using familiar characters.

Today, Simon has a number of duties with the program.

"I've given up some of the details. I'm working more on the creative end of things, finding the talent for the show — writers, actors — bringing creative talent to Sesame Street."

She also directs the taping of the series one day a week.

Simon said it has been fulfilling to be part of a show generations have grown up with.

"I like to say I work on Sesame Street. I'm very proud of it."

Another Jewish woman, Arlene Sherman, is leaving her mark on Sesame Street. Sherman, a Washington, D.C. native, is co-ordinating producer for the television series. It is Sherman's job to commission live action and animated films which are inserted into the series. She works with a large array of independent film producers to accomplish the task of inserting 20 such segments in each Sesame Street program.

"We have turned out to be the largest employer of independent film producers in the world," Sherman said.

Sherman solicits work from producers and they also contact her, all the while keeping the show's curriculum in mind.

"Over a season, I look to commission two hours of these segments — everything from 10 seconds to two to three minutes each in length. That means about 60 pieces a season," Sherman said.

Sherman said Sesame Street has new material all the time but has a vast video library to pull from, to re-use material that stands the test of time.

A graduate of New York University's School of Film and Television, Sherman joined the CTW's Sesame Street in 1978, after spending time in Europe working in the film industry.

"I came back to the States looking for a job and took a temporary position at Children's Television Workshop as a curriculum editor," Sherman said. "I liked the show so much that I just stayed."

Sherman couldn't think of a job she would rather have than working with Sesame Street.

"You also get to feel you're doing something important — you're teaching. And I adore working with the Muppets!"

Twenty-five years is a long time for any television series to survive, let alone a program which is geared to children. However, Sesame Street staff agree the show has been successful in part because the show has tried to be responsive to the changing needs of children, and to help them cope with reality.

"Sesame Street does program for reality — we have dealt with birth, death and more. But we go to special pains not to frighten children," Loman said.

"The show has been successful for two reasons. First of all, it's fun and second, it's because we challenge children — to work, to do something or to deal with whatever social issues we are dealing with," he added.

"It's hard work but it's very rewarding," said Stiles. "We're proud of what we do."

The final frontier

An Israeli-designed space telescope will help uncover the mysteries of the universe when it is launched from the Commonwealth of Independent States in 1995.

TAUVEX (Tel Aviv University Ultra Violet Explorer) is a joint effort between Tel Aviv University, the Israel Space Agency and El-Op Industries. Israel won the bid for the payload on the multinational satellite, the first scientific mission to observe celestial objects in the ultraviolet (UV) range.

The telescope will provide important missing information. While astronomers have tracked stars with visible light, radio waves, x-rays and infrared radiation, the exploration of the UV portion has been fragmentary.

"You cannot accurately observe the UV spectrum from the ground because the atmosphere scatters UV radiation," said Eytan Reis, head of business development for El-Op. "The only way to photograph distant and weak stars is by getting the scientific instrument out in space."

TAUVEX will zoom in on white dwarfs (young stars that emit high-energy ultraviolet radiation), binaries (stars that travel in pairs through space), galaxies and quasars (the most luminous objects at the edge of the universe).

"The search for quasars will be the most productive ever conducted," said Dr. Noah Brosch, an astronomer at the Wise Observatory of Tel Aviv University. "We expect to catalog more than 10,000 new quasars that will be identified by their UV-optical colors. Only about 4,000 are known today from ground-based surveys."

In addition, the space telescope will map the entire Virgo Cluster and 100 other galaxies. With the information, scientists can study the physics of neutron stars and black holes.

The satellite will have a longer orbit than most. Moving in an elliptical orbit, it will take three days to orbit the earth with an apogee of 200,000 km from the planet. Other satellites usually orbit in 1½ hours. The telescope has a viewing field 500 times wider than the wide field camera of the Hubble Space Telescope.

The satellite will remain in space for three years. All data transmitted will be received in Russian territory, but will be shared with scientists from the participating nations.

Bonds sales top $100 million in Canada

TORONTO — For the first time ever, Israel Bonds sales in Canada have topped $100 million. That's a $10 million increase over last year and $16 million more than in 1991.

Executive vice-president of Canada-Israel Securities Ltd., Charles Diamond, attributed the record sales to a combination of "great rates" and hard work by Bonds staff.

"Investors realize that Israel still needs Bonds and that Bonds are a sure, secure, high-interest investment, with no strings attached," he said.

One of this year's hottest attractions was the Canadian Variable Rate Interest Bond, now sold out, that guaranteed a 7½ per cent return.

Toronto had the most sales, with purchasers investing $50 million dollars in Bonds. Montreal ranked second at $35 million.

The largest single investor was businessman David Nadler, who bought $6 million in notes, which can be assigned to a bank by the government of Israel, for use as collateral by the purchaser.

About 12 per cent of those who buy Bonds are non-Jewish investors; among them are labor unions and pension funds.

Diamond expects 1994 to be an even better year because Israel Bonds now qualify for inclusion in self-directed RRSP and Registered Retirement Income Fund accounts.

Canada-Israel Securities is mounting the most extensive marketing campaign in its history to publicize the Bonds-RRSP association.

HELP!

You've helped recover 75% of old newspapers through your Blue Box. Now we need your help to get even more back. Ontario's paper mills make recycled newsprint out of every single old newspaper and flyer insert you give them – and that's still not enough. They actually have to import more from the U.S. If we recover more old newspapers, the less will go to dumps and the less mills will need to import. And the more municipal tax dollars we'll save. But we need your help to recycle as many newspapers as possible.

Recycling newspapers and flyer inserts is a real Ontario success story. Together, we can close the recycling loop.

Wedding videos are special says Video Magic

Founded three years ago, Video Magic produces videos of just about every conceivable kind, including music, corporate, training, as well as video coverage of special events.

However, to Griff Henderson and Greg Bianchini, Video Magic's Associate Producers (who have more than eleven years experience between them), wedding videos play a very special role in their business mix. "A wedding video is always very special to me" says Griff, "while our corporate clients appreciate the work we do, there is always a heartfelt pleasure in watching a bride and groom see their wedding video for the first time— it's great to see them relive the magic moments of their wedding day with pure joy".

Video Magic has earned its reputation by paying careful attention to what a couple want to see in their video. Interviews with close friends and relatives are often included, as well as treasured pictures from family photo albums.

Whenever possible Greg and Griff always check out the locations before the taping sessions— to make absolutely sure that no unforeseen problems present themselves on the "special day".

Although Griff and Greg always edit their video productions personally, there are times when they need to call on their pool of freelance talent to help tackle special problems such as a multiple camera shoot (two cameras are standard for a Video Magic wedding video). But, says Griff, "In a successful wedding video, editing is really the key— the editor tells the story, and we always keep in mind that there are no re-shoots at a wedding. So our camera people must get it right the first time, every time!

Video Magic uses the latest state-of-the-art digital camera and editing equipment. Which means that in most cases there is no need for obtrusive bright lights to get clear crisp images on tape. "People appreciate this" continues Griff, "bright lights make guests think they are under scrutiny, so they can't relax".

Video Magic offers two basic wedding packages: a two hour edited video covering the entire day's events and a "hi-light" video, generally 35 to 45 minutes in length. The latter also includes all the "raw footage" of the day's events.

Difficult as it might be to make a final decision on which video company to choose, Griff advises, "Don't leave it to the last minute or you might be disappointed. Book 6 months in advance, get references, and always make sure you have a written contract covering exactly what you expect to get for your money".

Marriage at Yonge and Bloor? The Hotel Plaza II says "Yes"!

Weddings are special anywhere, but there's nothing like the grand elegance of a premier downtown setting to underscore the "special" in "special occasion."

You can't get much more "downtown" than Yonge and Bloor, and where better to celebrate than at the fabulously renovated Hotel Plaza II?

In the face of a general downturn in hotel stopovers, The Plaza II is gaining share, going from 15% to 80% penetration of market. And, suggests General Manager Michael Kahler, "We expect to exceed market share in the very near future."

The reasons for the hotel's upsurge in popularity are immediate and obvious. After Rank Hotels North America assumed management last year, the property's public meeting areas and banquet rooms underwent extensive renovation.

The Forest Hill Room now occupies the area previously known as The Greenery. The original wall of windows has been retained to make this one of the lightest, most elegant ballrooms in the city. It will seat 350 guests at dinner.

The guest rooms at the Plaza II were completely redecorated 18 months ago. In December 1993, the hotel unveiled Matisse, a new restaurant and bar designed by Robynne Moncur. The internationally known creative consulting firm, Kurtz Mann of Toronto, executed the reproduction of many well-known Matisse masterpieces. The eclectic international menu features Italian, Asian, Southern Californian, Middle Eastern and French cuisine.

You'll find the catering staff courteous and thorough. The chef will personally consult with you and your family. Tastings are available for up to four people to ensure you're happy with your menu choices.

The bride and groom will enjoy a complimentary elegant bridal suite with chilled champagne and ensuite continental breakfast the morning after the wedding. Guests can take advantage of special rates from Friday to Sunday.

Catering Sales Manager Andrea Stokes (961-8000, ext. 6055) will be happy to discuss your wedding plans with you.

Weddings are a labor of love at Toronto Marriott Eaton Centre

At the Toronto Marriott Eaton Centre Hotel, every wedding is a labor of love.

Catherine Searle, the Marriott's in-house consultant, has the tact, taste and experience to transform your cherished dreams into a most memorable occasion.

Well-versed in all the subtleties of wedding etiquette, from announcing the bridal couple to special toasts, she will help you plan the itinerary for your wedding day. She attends every wedding she helps to plan, ensuring nothing less than perfection on that special day.

With Searle assisting, you save money too, since you can forgo the services of a consultant.

If you wish, she will recommend florists, photographers, entertainers and other professionals. You contact them directly to discuss your requirements in detail. "That way the couple gets what they want, not what we assume they like," says Stan van Woerkens, the Marriott's Director of Catering Sales.

The hotel's chef will personally review your catering needs and work with you to develop a menu unique to your wedding style. And, when you sample the food, the chef is on hand to hear your comments.

If you would prefer kosher food, the Marriott will be happy to work with a caterer of your choice.

The hotel has two elegant ballrooms, both perfect for your wedding celebration. You and up to 650 guests can dine and dance under the sparkling chandeliers of the Grand Ballroom. The smaller Trinity Ballroom, with five chandeliers, accommodates up to 250. Both ballrooms can be divided for smaller groups.

The Marriott offers a complimentary room, complete with champagne, to the bridal couple on their wedding night. Out-of-town guests can stay at the hotel for a special rate of $89, single or double occupancy, on the night of the wedding. On request, the Marriott will mail reservation cards to your guests in advance.

With Marriott hotels and resorts around the world, you can spend your honeymoon at a Marriott in Cancun, Bermuda, the Barbados, Arizona or Europe.

The Marriott provides impeccable service and creative menu planning for all your special occasions, from intimate family gatherings to large social functions. Whether you are having a wedding, a shower, an engagement party or an anniversary party, everything will be artfully arrayed and beautifully presented.

As part of the hotel's portfolio of special services, the Marriott has the expertise to help you plan a bar or bat mitzvah.

To discuss your wedding or next special event with a professional at the Marriott, call (416) 343-9002.

For your next occasion, consider the hotel that brings you the excitement of the city.
Only to make it disappear
once you step inside.

Stunning floral bouquets. Candlelight dinners. Fabulous ice sculptures. They're all part of what makes the Toronto Marriott Eaton Centre an elegant choice for your next event. With our creative menus and innovative staff, we'll create an ambience that's perfect for you and your guests.

Select our hotel for your wedding reception and a complimentary bedroom will be set aside for the bride and groom. You will also receive our one year anniversary present, a free night's stay. Call us at (416) 597-9200 and turn your next special occasion into something wonderful.

Glen Abbey does it all

Imagine your wedding ceremony taking place in a historic stone mansion overlooking a scenic river valley. Later, as your photos are taken amid the beautiful surroundings, your guests stroll, or are chauffeured, to a magnificent new facility for hors d'oeuvres and cocktails. As they mingle, they gaze out over Canada's premier golf course.

When you and the wedding party arrive, a sumptuous dinner is served. After dinner, with toasting and speeches completed, dancing continues until the wee hours to the accompaniment of a disc jockey or live entertainment.

"We are dedicated to making every wedding at Glen Abbey a memorable event," says Catering Manager Glenn Phillips. "The last thing anyone needs is to be concerned about last-minute problems. Our staff has years of experience in ensuring that every detail is anticipated and dealt with, so our guests can relax and enjoy themselves. Personalized planning is the key to our years of success."

Phillips is justly proud of the stunning facility at Glen Abbey, home of the Bell Canadian Open Golf Championship. A massive reconstruction project over the winter will result in a facility more than double the size of the previous clubhouse.

"Regardless of the size of your party, our new facility offers an appropriate setting," he says. Three rooms, each with floor-to-ceiling glass walls, can accommodate gatherings from 50 to 250 guests. Each room has a patio or walkout so guests can enjoy the view.

Executive Chef James Stewart supervises the preparation of Glen Abbey's famed cuisine in a state-of-the-art kitchen.

"Glen Abbey is becoming as renowned for its food as for its golf," says the creative Stewart, who is responsible for the wide variety of delectable and reasonably priced dishes on the menu.

"Our set menu is extensive and varied, ranging from items such as veal marsala to Cornish game hens with lingonberry sauce. Of course, we are always prepared to work with guests to create something unique for a special occasion."

Should you desire to have your ceremony at Glen Abbey, it will take place in the sprawling stone mansion just a few metres away from the clubhouse. Designated as a historic building, the former Jesuit retreat is a picture-perfect setting to begin your special day.

"At Glen Abbey, we endeavor to anticipate your every need," says Phillips. "This day is a highlight of your life; we try to ensure that it will remain a perfect memory."

Lina's continues 25 year tradition of making brides look beautiful

Elegant surroundings, professional service and high quality attire are only some of the reasons that brides and their families have been flocking to Lina's for almost 25 years.

With gowns, dresses and two-piece outfits to suit brides, mothers and wedding guests, as well as all the accessories from veils to shoes to garters, there is no reason for a bride to go into another store.

Lina's prides itself on professional, individualized service, and all staff members are highly trained and attuned to the needs of each person. Isolated bridal salons, adorned with loveseats, muted colors, chandeliers and mirrors, allow the bride privacy, while the elegant yet cozy surroundings put her in the mood to plan a romantic wedding.

Custom-made attire

Staff at Lina's will custom-make an outfit, but the salon carries so many labels, that most brides find exactly what they want in the store. With prices ranging from as low as $700 right up to couturier, there really is something for everyone, and on-site alterationists have the facilities to make every garment look custom-made.

Traditional outfits

Sam Pollari says that most first-time brides choose white gowns and although the trend is towards the simpler dress, traditional gowns are still important. "A multi-layered Cinderella-type skirt gives a romantic look to a gown. Second-time brides, or those opting for a more informal look often choose a brocade suit in ivory."

Whatever the bride's taste, Pollari is confident that Lina's is the place to shop. "Our staff is able to assess her needs and come up with the perfect garment. They sometimes work on a hunch and know what the bride wants before she can describe it herself."

Classy's 75th birthday marked by great savings

Classy Formal Wear has been dressing Canadian men in high-fashion, quality tuxedos and formal wear since Marcus Hecht first founded the "one-store" operation in 1919.

Through the continued efforts of Marcus' son and grandson, Joe and Stephen Hecht, the company has been able to carry on the original philosophies and policies into the '90s.

Customers can rent or buy their tuxedos and formal wear accessories at any one of the 39 Classy stores across Canada.

Classy has three locations in Montreal, one each in Laval, LaSalle, Brossard, Pointe Claire and Quebec City. There are 11 locations to choose from in Ontario, including one at Square One Mall in Mississauga, two in Scarborough and three Toronto stores located at Yonge Street, Yorkdale Shopping Mall and Dufferin Mall.

This new year of 1994 doesn't represent just another year for Canada's only formal wear rental chain. Rather it marks an exceptional anniversary year for Classy and their customers who have supported them over the years.

To kick off their 75th birthday celebration, Classy has decided to start the year off with a bang and give their customers a Classy birthday gift they'll never forget.

From now until Feb. 27, you can reserve any tuxedo rental of your choice in advance for only $69 even if your event is in July or even December, 1994. It is the perfect opportunity for grooms, ushers, and especially high school and university graduates to take advantage of this spectacular birthday savings special.

The $69 fee includes everything from the tuxedo to the cummerbund, tie or bow-tie, shirt, suspenders and jewelry.

Slightly fashion forward

Another 75th anniversary surprise is the introduction of Classy's private label — The Signature Collection.

According to the vice-president of marketing, Harold Simpkins, "the tuxedos in The Signature Collection are all slightly fashion forward garments that are available in basic black and have been tailored from fine Italian wool by MARZOTTO."

The Signature Collection is available in three European styles: the three button notch-lapel; the six button double breasted peak-lapel; and the six button double breasted shawl-collar.

Every tuxedo found in a Classy store is unique and exclusive to them. For example, the Yves Saint Laurent collection is under exclusive Canadian licence to Classy and this gives them the right to decide which stores will be able to sell the line other than their own stores.

Classy has grown over the past 75 years because they have changed with the times and Classy has always been a proven creator of trends in men's formal wear fashions in Canada.

"We pay close attention to the changes in men's regular suits because they virtually have an effect on the formal wear market two to three years down the road," says Simpkins. "We also tour the men's wear shows in Europe and the United States, in order to keep up with the variations in styles from year to year, so that we can offer a variety for our customers to choose from."

There has been a significant change in the '90s, compared to the styles of the '80s. The 1980s showed a popular demand for patterns in the actual materials of the tuxedos and grey became an increasingly popular color for men. However, the 1990s has created a shift in the demand for more contemporary styles, a basic black look and a skyrocketing demand for fashionable vests.

Just like in 1919, Classy still takes great pride in the quality of every tuxedo they rent and sell. That's why in 1994, they have a team that strictly controls the quality of the materials purchased to make their garments and they continuously oversee the manufacturing by their subcontractors.

Daring brocade vests

In 1994, you can look forward to renting a wonderful selection of patterned cummerbunds and matching bow-ties in various shades of burgandy, grey, black, red and brown. Or, the slightly more daring fashion-conscious man can choose from a number of colorful solid combinations or colorfully patterned vests and matching bow-ties. The brocade vests are sure to make a man stand out in a crowd.

So don't wait, take advantage of Classy's birthday gift savings and reserve your tuxedo rental today.

Simply Elegant. Simply Classy.

CLASSY'S 75TH ANNIVERSARY 1994

The Three-button Notch-lapel tuxedo from Classy's new Signature Collection. Worn with the striking Monte Carlo vest.

$69 That's Classy's 75th anniversary price for any tuxedo rental when you reserve before February 27, 1994. Choose from Classy's all new Signature Collection, three bold new looks that are right for any wedding celebration. Or from Classy's Yves Saint Laurent or Uomo Classico Collections. All simply elegant. All exclusive to Classy.

Puttin' on the Glitz with Toronto's Party Pros

"We're thrilled with the way this event has evolved", says a smiling Rick Levine, who along with Lynn Cohen and Saul Chapman will share the responsibilities of coordinating the major community event at Temple Sinai which will see over thirty party service companies coming together to present their products and services in a unique format. "Any person who has had the experience of planning a party can truly appreciate the amount of work that goes on behind the scenes and knows what sort of commitment and organization is required. Many people feel overwhelmed after taking on all these party planning responsibilities themselves." On Tuesday, January 25th, We're Having A Party is where the public can meet the people who will make the difference, for a second consecutive year in a row.

"The idea of organizing a function and combining all of our creative energies struck us as an exciting and novel way to reach the public while at the same time making it fun for those shopping the party market", declares Lynn Cohen, one of Toronto's busiest bridal and party consultants. "The event was such an overwhelming success last year, we decided to enjoy it all over again. Unlike the many conventional trade shows we've all attended, this party displays the talents and efforts of the collective energy as well as individuals involved. The guests will be sampling products and services in a unique atmosphere giving them a perfect opportunity to make decisions based on what they see, hear and taste for themselves."

"We were fortunate to get several wonderful people involved from the beginning such as Saul Chapman, the caterer at Temple Sinai, Lynn Cohen and Jennifer Sharpe, experienced bridal and party consultants, who have provided the planning expertise that this kind of project requires", says Rick Levine, a twenty year veteran of the music and party scene. "Our community has a great number of very talented people involved in the party services industry. In order to have focus while at the same time offering a variety, it was decided we stage an event that would showcase a medley of vendors within each category. That's why you'll see more than one orchestra, florist or photographer for example. We expect people at all the various stages of their party planning voyage to find this presentation very beneficial. With the free admission and the many give a ways planned our event should be the talk of the town."

"Everyone attending will see the total picture and at the same time each company at the event will highlight their own unique creative abilities. People will be able to obtain assistance in coordinating all the various components of a party from start to finish", states Lynn Cohen, as she holds up a few samples. The public can see beautiful invitations, paper products, baskets and novelty items, by Gilda Lefton of Stationery Plus or Invitations by Michelle Hoppe.

The Candy Man / Kosher Natural, will offer their famous candy tables and favours while Happy Days will display their custom centre pieces and unique party decor. The rental of a popcorn, candy floss or donut making machine can be arranged through either company.

The Travel Network, located at 1920 Avenue Rd. is on hand to provide information on travel and honeymoon destinations. Decorations, floral arrangements and set ups are being coordinated by four excellent companies: Susanne Carlascio and Elaine Birnbaum of Greenleaves and Petals , Renie Hotz of Hullaballoon , Karen Taylor of Greene and Wilde and Jean Louis Fortin of June Flowers and Joanne Schwarz of Table Wraps. The catering, of course at the Temple, will be handled by top party caterer Saul Chapman of Chapman's Catering, who is planning some delicious delicacies for everyone to sample.

"No Wedding Bar/Bat Mitzvah would be complete without music and this party promises to be spectacular", enthuses Lynn Cohen. Two of Toronto's most versatile orchestras, The Rick Levine Band and The Shelley Miller Band will alternately showcase at the event offering potential clients the opportunity to listen and dance to their music first hand. The Karen Silver Duo will offer a compact musical display and Mister Disc Jockey will provide additional sounds for your listening pleasure.

"As we all know a primary concern of any event is looking good," says Lynn Cohen. Estee Levine and Francine Birken shall demonstrate their individual approaches in make-up for that special occasion and share tips on everyday make-up and skin care. A preview of the latest jewellery collections of Jordan Stuart Goldsmiths from their store in the Fairview Mall and Paul Woszczyna of Independent Jewellers will explain why diamonds are considered to be a girl's best friend. Everyone will get a close look at Ritché's exquisite bridal gowns, attendant's fashions and evening wear as the models circulate throughout the party. Nationally renown Freeman Formalwear provides a look at the latest styles in gentlemen and young men's formal attire. According to Rick Levine, "my orchestra members perform in tuxedos and we've always found Freeman to provide excellent service and a first class product".

Established photographer Hudson Taylor, whose studio has recently relocated to a charming building on 12 Birch Ave. in midtown Toronto will be on hand to display his works, as will popular photographer Mark Stern whose studio is on Steeles Ave. Videographers Richard Saunders of Redstone Pictures and Abe Salzman of Video Affairs will greet the public and record the event for posterity. Lorac Wine will display and be pleased to answer any questions you may have on the use and traditions of Kosher Wine. One of Toronto's best known retailers, Bronson's China and Gifts whose store is located at the corner of Yonge and Steeles, will be there to display many of the lovely gifts from their exclusive Bridal Registry. A current edition of the venerable planning and etiquette authority The Wedding Guide will be available free to all future brides in attendance with an opportunity to register their name in a contest for marvellous prizes and gifts.

"This group is representative of our entire industry...as professionals we pride ourselves on hard work and excellence. Hopefully the guests who attend our party", concludes Levine, "are able to make some new contacts, see some old friends, and experience something of value to help make their next party a real success."

Hotel offers one-stop shopping for brides

The elegant Sutton Place Grande Hotel-Le Meridien Toronto, located in the heart of the city, offers the bride-to-be one-stop shopping for her wedding.

Two beautiful ballrooms in the hotel are available for the ceremony and the dinner-dance. A luxurious honeymoon suite and comfortable accommodation for out-of-town guests are only steps away from the ballrooms.

Lisa Fratepietro, the hotel's catering manager, will be happy to recommend florists, decorators, photographers and entertainers such as bands and DJs.

If anyone in the bridal party has any questions, Fratepietro is there to help. In the past she has been asked where in the ballroom the chupah ought to be placed, how to set up a receiving line and how to introduce the bride and groom into the room.

Fratepietro also works closely with consultants. She said consultants attend nearly half of the weddings at the Sutton Place. "My role is as involved or as removed as the client wishes me to be," she says.

The Sutton Place has been patronized by the Jewish community for many years and is a favorite spot for weddings. Although there is no kosher kitchen, the hotel can provide kosher meals prepared by COR-approved caterers, for those few individuals who request it. "We recognize that the Jewish community has special dietary requirements and we cater to them," Fratepietro said.

The hotel's kitchen prepares an incredible variety of delicious food, everything from appetizers to desserts.

The hotel's two very distinctive ballrooms are perfect for weddings.

In the Queen Victoria ballroom, ornate crystal chandeliers and a restored original oil painting of the lady herself give this spectacular ballroom room a flavor of refinement long since past. The Queen Victoria ballroom may be partitioned into two sections and can accommodate up to three hundred guests.

Stop 33, for simchas of up to 260, is a favorite for weddings and other social functions because of its floor-to-ceiling, panoramic view of Toronto skyline.

The hotel's facilities and catering services are available for bar and bat mitzvahs, engagement and anniversary parties or any of your other special occasions.

The Sutton Place Grande Hotel-Le Meridien Toronto includes 13 meeting and banquet rooms, the renowned Sanssouci restaurant, a beauty salon, a health and fitness club, and a business centre.

Luxury suites are individually decorated and furnished with antiques, porcelain collectibles and art pertaining to various operas, such as Don Carlos, Evita and La Boheme.

Guest rooms come equipped with an in-room safe, mini-bar, plush bathrobe, hairdryer and luxury bathroom amenities. Each room has two telephones with voice-mail.

If you wish to discuss your wedding requirements with the staff of Sutton Place, call (416) 324-6424.

DiNardo's winning combo provides gourmet foods and beautiful settings

Add well-presented gourmet food, served by professional personnel to an elegant Georgian mansion, and the winning combination is Di Nardo's, a banquet facility in Aurora, one mile north of Richmond Hill.

Guests arriving at Di Nardo's are immediately attracted by the fully landscaped courtyard adorned by trees, flowerbeds and an interlocking walkway. With all parking contained behind the building, the elegance of the entrance is not marred. A licence to serve drinks outside allows guests to wander the spacious, immaculately-kept grounds while sipping their favorite drinks.

Comfortable bridal suite

The interior of the mansion, designed by well-known Toronto interior designer David Margulis, is spacious, airy and homey. Rising from the black and white marble floor of the lobby is a 120 foot, open-treed, spiral staircase, hand-done in wrought-iron. A small lobby on the second floor has double French doors opening onto a balcony that overlooks three-acre estate homes. A perfect setting for those romantic wedding pictures.

Brides getting married at Di Nardo's are treated well from the moment they enter the mansion. A large, comfortable bridal suite always has a bottle of champagne waiting and, should anyone in the bridal party request a snack before the ceremony, someone is always at hand to serve them.

The main ballroom has a 24-foot-high ceiling and is capable of seating 500 people. The room, done in pastel designer tones is reminiscent of a royal ballroom. Arched Palladian windows let in natural light, and there are no pillars or encumbrances.

Service in the dining room is presented by professional, knowledgeable personnel, and waiters are assisted by other waiters which means excellent, quality service. Guests are assured of hot, gourmet food and because there are no pre-printed menus, each party is treated individually. Hosts meet with the caterer, and after assessing the guest list, come up with a menu that is suitable for everyone. Kosher and vegetarian meals are available upon request.

Owner, Joseph Di Nardo invites everyone to come in and discover one of the best kept secrets in the industry. "We are sure to surpass all our clients' expectations."

Our Proposal.

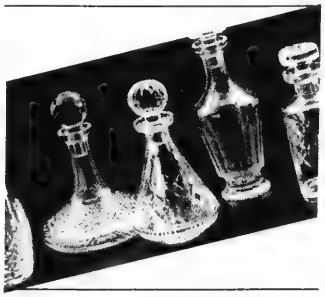
Store's bridal registry offers quality, service and affordable prices

At Bronson's China & Gifts, dedication to service has been a significant factor in creating their reputation for excellence.

"This is a customer-oriented store," says owner Ilene Bronsteter, who has been serving brides for over 14 years now at the spacious location in Thornhill.

Many of her clients have heard about Bronson's through word of mouth, from the glowing recommendations of their friends and relatives.



Bronsteter prides herself on having one of the best bridal registries in the country and she says it caters to any budget.

The friendly staff of Bronson's helps brides pick out their patterns and assists them in co-ordinating their tabletops from the store's huge selection of high-quality dinnerware, flatware, stemware and giftware.

The atmosphere in the store is relaxed and unintimidating. Specializing in catering to brides, the knowledgeable staff are there to supply helpful service.

The huge selection of quality items at Bronson's means the store has something for every bride.

Bronson's offers modern and contemporary designs, as well as traditional patterns from around the world.

The international brand names Bronson's carries include Rosenthal, Mikasa, Noritake, Wedgwood, Fitz & Floyd, Villeroy & Boch and many others. Beautiful handpainted Italian designs are available too.

And, with Bronson's competitive pricing policy, brides always get the best price.

The 7,000-sq. ft. store also offers a full range of kitchen and decorative giftware. Stock is constantly updated, so customers are sure to find the latest in home-decorating items.

Gift wrapping, same-day delivery and telephone orders are a few of Bronson's special services. As their inventory is computerized, service is quick.

Bronson's is located at 2 Steeles Ave. W. and parking is plentiful. Bronson's is open seven days a week for bridal convenience.

Bra Bar stresses personal comfort when shopping for gown undergarments

Wedding gowns and evening dresses are the hardest to fit to be comfortable.

You need to find a Perfect Fit merry widow or bustiere almost before you look at gowns unless you are an A cup. Even then your personal comfort must be your first consideration, even if it means not quite such a low back gown.

At Bra Bar & Swimsuits Etcetera we stress the C-O-M-F-O-R-T factor continuously. You wear a bra sometimes for 14 hours a day — your special events bras — 8-10 hours — your swimsuits for many hours in hot climates.

Going south for your honeymoon or winter vacation how about taking cotton-lycra bras — enough stretchability in the fabric for comfort and a little cooler than your regular bras.

Suggest cotton-lycra fabrics

Our comfort advice for southern points is cotton-lycra fabric — in many guises from beautiful white undies through to exotic swimwear. Cotton-lycra lends its texture very well to the fabulous mesh suits this seaon.

Beading on the bikinis

The swimsuit story this year is in the Sand & Desert look — fabulous beadings on the bikinis and one-piece suits make 1994 miles away from snow and ice — (where you want to be).

The new Isotoner suits are in our stores and are great for the daily swimmer. These suits offer a one year guarantee. They are the only suits on the market made from this new yarn — fantastic. New suits are arriving all the time and if you see a suit you like and we are missing a size, we will happily order it for you. Do drop in to our own sunny south and feel that sunshine warmth we all crave in our snowy climate.

It's an exciting Season at Bra Bar & Swimsuits Etcetera. Come see us soon.

Bachers register at Bronson's

"I applied for the Bridal Administrator's position at Bronson's because I had heard so many positive comments from my friends and family about Bronson's attention and service to new brides in selecting their registry."
Samantha Bacher, 1993

Samantha Brown knew from her experience as Bridal Administrator for Bronson's, how important customer service is. After getting engaged and registering at Bronson's herself, she was able to experience the attentive and patient customer service firsthand.

Bronson's bridal consultants helped her co-ordinate her table selection from a vast display of china, flatware, stemware, and kitchenware patterns and they took extra special care and attention to detail when selections were made on her behalf by her friends and family.

With a FOURTEEN YEAR history of "personal service", their knowledgeable bridal consultants willingly assist in advising and co-ordinating gifts to complement any lifestyle. And they treat your guests with courtesy and respect ... that's why they've been around so long.

Join the thousands of brides who have registered at Bronson's over the last decade – come in and chat with them ... you'll experience the Bronson's difference ... the Bronson's 'personal touch'.

Advanced procedure an alternative to makeup

IMAGINE BEING ABLE TO CRY AT YOUR WEDDING WITHOUT HAVING TO WORRY ABOUT YOUR MAKEUP RUNNING.

For women who would like an alternative to the time consuming task of applying make-up, there is an advanced process available.

Known as Micro Pigment Implantation, it is available at the CLINIQUE DE BEAUTE LYNE RICHARD, an upscale clinic located in the trendy Yorkville district of Toronto.

Leading innovator

This non-surgical, medically supervised technique involves applying colored mineral pigment just beneath the basal (top) layer of the skin to produce permanent cosmetic creations such as eyeliner, natural looking, three dimensional eyebrows or fuller, better defined lips. The process can also be used to correct natural skin defects like birthmarks or to camouflage scars.

"Cosmetic creations through micro pigment implantation is ideal for the active woman who doesn't always have the time to put on her make-up, but who wishes to put her best 'face' forward at all times," notes Lyne Richard, founder of CLINIQUE DE BEAUTE LYNE RICHARD. "Athletes, as well as women who tend to develop allergies to beauty products, can also benefit immensely from this technique."

Established over 13 years ago in Quebec City and Montreal, and with thousands of satisfied clients, the CLINIQUE DE BEAUTE LYNE RICHARD has evolved into a leading innovator in the art and science of micro pigment implantation more commonly known as "permanent cosmetic creations."

This technique has proven so successful and popular that Richard opened a third clinic in Boca Raton, Florida last summer, with the Toronto clinic quickly following.

For more information, contact: Dorothy Kizoff, Director of Operations, 113 Yorkville Avenue, Toronto, M5R 1C1 at 972-7636.

PARADISE OFFERS EXCELLENCE IN KOSHER CUISINE

The Paradise Banquet and Convention Centre is located one block south of Highway 7 at 7601 Jane Street in Concord.

The facility can accommodate 10 to 1,500 guests for weddings, showers, Bar/Bat Mitzvahs, a briss, or a baby naming. Whatever the simcha the Paradise can cater to your needs.

The kosher facilities at Paradise are under the strict supervision of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR). The chef at Paradise can create exquisite cuisine from their numerous recipes or accommodate your own creations. The service is first class with French white glove service, and waiters are friendly and attentive.

There are five luxurious ballrooms to choose from with something to please everyone. Paradise recently renovated the Tivoli, Oasis and Palm Rooms and hired award winning designers to create the new look. Glittering customized copper tube chandeliers which come equipped with electronic digital lighting. Pin lighting on tables to accent flower arrangements. Marble fountains and three-color granite flooring with back-lit sand-blasted glass walls.

The Classic Room has smoke machines for special effect. They offer indoor fireworks and laser graphic shows upon request.

The Paradise can create theme nights for any occasion. They will assist in arranging special entertainment, such as Las Vegas dancers, impersonators, Hawaiian nights or tropical themes. Country/Western, Tex-Mex, Roman, Dynasty themes, as well as children's magical shows are no problem for the professionals at Paradise.

The Paradise offers specials for Weddings or simchas booked in the months of January through April. They will decorate the room with balloons free of charge when you book your Bar/Bat Mitzvah or baby naming between January and April of 1994.

Dining is an experience to treasure at the Paradise, the kosher food has been getting wonderful reviews. They even offer sample dinners when you book your affair at the Paradise.

With over 30 years experience in the catering business, Paradise knows how to meet your needs, whether you choose their facility or have them cater at the location of your choice. Paradise are experienced professionals in their field.

Lavee Studios specialize in creating fine portraiture

Joe Lavee is the man behind the name Lavee Studios, one of the most respected photographic establishments in Toronto, specializing in fine portraiture. He is a second-generation photographer; he began his career in Montreal, and moved to Toronto in 1977. For as long as Joe can remember, the camera has been an important part of his life.

For many years, Joe has been developing and creating his own unique style. In his long career, he has mastered every aspect of portrait photography, from children and families to executives and celebrities.

His bridal photography is an art form that combines romantic classic with contemporary styles. His specialty is soft portraiture which makes use of sophisticated lenses and lighting techniques, to give the portraits that special glamorous effect.

Lasting memories

At Lavee, you will enjoy complete photographic services which include retouching, enhancement and texturizing of your portraits.

When you come in for your consultation, you will be able to view Joe's work; you will also meet with Joe himself, to discuss your personal needs. You will be assured that he, accompanied by his assistant, will photograph your wedding in person, and remain at the event from beginning to end.

Standards of excellence

Besides being an outstanding portrait photographer. Joe Lavee is accomplished in the field of video. Thus, he trains his videographers to meet his own standards of excellence. Lavee Studios have their own state-of-the-art video production facilities on the premises, where the videotapes are fine-edited.

Your wedding photography will be one of your dearest possessions, the only lasting visual memory of a special and unique day. To capture these memories, make no compromise when choosing your photographer.

Lavee Studios is conveniently located in the heart of North York, at Sheppard and Yonge.

Moshe Video/Electroto offers complete wedding photo & video service

"Videos for weddings are now as indispensable as photography," says Moshe Amzallag, owner of Moshe Video & Photo.

The professional photographer, who has been in business for 15 years, should know. With three stores in Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, the rapidly expanding business caters to a large segment of the wedding market, offering special knowledge in photographing Orthodox Jewish weddings.

Amzallag suggests booking a photographer two to three months in advance, to ensure the services of his complete team, which consists of two principal still photographers, two people filming videos, and an assistant.

A one-third deposit is required upon booking. Prices range from $800 to $1,200 for still photographs, with the same range for videos, depending on the size of the assignment.

Proofs for both wedding photos and videos are ready in three weeks, thanks to Moshe Video's extensive in-house operation, which includes transfers of film to video, creating excellent prints from video, and a wide range of special effects to enhance the memorable day.

The bridal couple receives 250 proofs, from which they select a minimum of 40 eight by ten prints.

A new trend in wedding photography is the use of black and white shots, with a total of four or five being selected for the final album. Black and white photos have a nostalgic, old world quality about them, says Moshe, and they stand out dramatically from the standard color shots.

Special effects are more in demand than ever, with double exposures, superimpositions of the bride and groom's faces on flowers, glasses or invitations proving popular. Video vignettes telling the story of the bridal couple's lives before and during courtship, recreated through fade-outs and old photos, are currently popular. In consultation with the couple, Moshe chooses music to suit the theme of each video, which runs two to two-and-a-half hours.

Beautifully decorated albums are an important feature of the total picture, and Moshe's offers bridal couples a choice of leather, leatherette, silk or velvet in white or ivory (blue is available for bar mitzvahs).

Also known as Electroto, the company offers a full range of services in video and film, with a speciality in transferring old films to video. Customers can also rent an editing room for their own use, in company with a technician or alone, to create their own videos.

The company provides transcoding and duplication services for up to 60 transfers at a time, with any machine in the world. They make and sell their own cassettes, and rent and repair any type of video and related equipment.

Moshe Video has locations in Montreal at 4637 Van Horne, telephone (514) 341-6194; in Toronto, 3889 Bathurst, telephone (416) 638-3734; and in Ottawa, 1619 Carling, telephone (613) 729-3382.

Fashionable silk accessories jazz up men's attire

Santostefano offers men of all age groups a world of fashionable silk accessories that are sure to compliment and jazz up all your suits, separates, co-ordinates and casual attire.

The store, located at 138 Cumberland has been open a little over a year now and their success can be attributed to their wide variety of fashionable silk ties, bow ties, cummerbunds, pocket squares, scarves, boxing shorts, casual and dressy shirts, matching shirts and ties, robes, pyjamas and even women's silk scarves.

Everything in the store is manufactured and designed by their team in Italy, from the silk itself to the extraordinary designs and patterns used. Their garments and accessories can only be found in their Santostefano stores in Toronto, Montreal, Brazil and Torino.

Feel great

When you purchase an item at Santostefano, you can be sure that you won't bump into someone on the street, at work, or even at a wedding and be embarrassed to see them wearing the same shirt, tie, bowtie or cummerbund as you, because every item is manufactured in limited quantities. This allows you the opportunity to be unique.

"It is important for people to know that we specialize in silk products that make you look and feel great and that we truly have something for everyone's taste," says Jason Gontier, a Santostefano sales consultant.

Marble-pattern

Prices range from $55 to $125 for ties and bowties and include a fabulous selection of colors and designs including marble-patterned ties and bowties (with and without rhinestones), pleated bowties, California ties and pins.

"Some of the patterns have been designed with super-imposed images and bright colors, making them special and one of a kind — like our patchwork ties," says sales consultant Sarah Gaon. "But we also carry a full selection of solid colors and conservative patterns for those men who want them.

You can also choose from a variety of sets, including matching suspender, pocket square and either a tie or bowtie set for only $295.

And for that special day in every man's life, when he finally takes the plunge, custom-designed cummerbund, bowtie and pocket scarf sets can be made for the groom and his ushers. You should give Santostefano a minimum of two to three months advance notice, especially if you also want matching vests.

SPECTACULAR savings at Ritché bridal sale

It's the event of the year that brides from across Ontario wait for. This week Ritché is having their annual Bridal Super Sale with over 1,000 wedding gowns reduced up to 80 per cent off retail prices. Hundreds of brand new gowns from sizes 4 to 44 are arriving just for the sale.

In the tradition of Ritché, the gowns are of the greatest variety: silks, satins, tulles and organzas in a range of styles from elaborate, traditional to simple elegance.

There are two reasons for the popularity of this annual sale. First is the incredible savings on top-quality designer gowns.

Second is the service and reputation of Ritché — a family-run business for over 40 years. Full service is provided for all brides after the sale at either location — 1662 Avenue Road (south of 401) or 423 Richmond St. W. (at Spadina). Brides can return for all the attention they deserve and receive the expertise of the finest alteration department.

Those brides who cannot make it to the sale should visit one of the stores. They feature the largest selection of designer gowns available. And of course, there are spectacular Ritché gowns. You can choose one of Mr. Ritché's original designs of imported fabrics or have him custom design one especially for you.

After more than forty years of creating custom gowns and serving Canadian brides, Ritché is renowned for style, selection and personalized service. The stores carry bridal gowns to suit any budget, and always have special promotion gowns for year-round savings.

The Avenue Road store has an entire floor of beautiful mothers' dresses, evening wear, and party dresses. This month many new bridesmaid and flowergirl styles are arriving for 1994 weddings. From top to bottom the entire wedding party is well-apparelled at Ritché.

The Ritché Super Sale is at the Holiday Inn-Yorkdale — 3450 Dufferin Street (across from Yorkdale Shopping Plaza). See the ad for sale hours.

Stuart Moscoe, known for a high level of personal service and the superb quality of his work, creates beautiful and exciting pictures of your wedding.

Custom service begins when you consult with Stuart, who will advise you on the kind of package that best suits you. You can select from one of his many ready-made packages, or create a personalized package of your own.

Stuart will shoot either color or classic black and white pictures or a combination of both, according to your preference. On your wedding day, he will pay attention to the smallest detail while maintaining a relaxed attitude and atmosphere. Proofs will be ready within two weeks.

Personalized service continues when you choose your pictures.

The studio provides custom retouching, print finishing and framing, as well as a full range of albums to suit your individual style.

Stuart also shoots bar and bat mitzvahs and family, children's and executive portraits, always providing the same conscientious and personal service.

Over the past five years, Stuart's photographs have captured the special moments in the lives of many people. His training includes a Bachelor of Applied Arts in photographic arts from Ryerson. References are available upon request.

Your pictures will last a lifetime. Call (905)881-8769 to make an appointment to meet Stuart and discuss your needs.

The trend setters continue on ...

If you're planning a party or a special event, The Shelley Miller Band is definitely the right choice if you want to keep your guests entertained with fun, laughter and music all night long.

With over 25 years of experience in the music industry, Shelley will continue to lead the original band members, with the exception of partner Saul Helman who has decided to pursue other career interests.

The band consists of Shelley as manager, bandleader and bass player, and features his talented wife Sharon Smith-Miller, Jim Gillard and Robin Langdon as lead vocalists, along with other vocalist/musicians on drums, guitar, keyboards and saxophone.

Depending on the size of your party and your budget, you can have the size of the band customized to suit your needs.

"Whether it's a wedding, bar mitzvah, anniversary, engagement, birthday or a corporate function, we know and understand just how important these special events are for both you and your guests," says Shelley.

"We're here to make sure everyone will walk away with fond memories that will last a lifetime."

The Shelley Miller Band offers you fully rehearsed professional musicians and state-of-the-art instruments, lighting and sound equipment. They also provide one of the largest rosters of songs on the market, including top 40, rock classics, Jewish folk music and love ballads.

As an experienced bandleader, Shelley will customize the music according to your preference and will assist with co-ordinating your event, from when the speeches are made to special introductions, announcements and candlelighting.

He will also inform the camera crew when something important or special is about to happen — like the horah or the bride dancing with her father — so they can capture the moment on video.

Shelley says: "We try to encourage family and friends to sing special songs at these parties, but we do appreciate advance notice, so that we can rehearse with them prior to the event. We really enjoy making everyone's dreams come true.

"It is important to see and hear for yourself what you are about to buy. That's why we offer our clients the opportunity to come to one of the events we are playing at, while keeping in mind that the music is customized to meet the desires and needs of each party."

If you are unable to attend one of the parties the band is playing for, Shelley will arrange to have a demonstration tape cassette for you to listen to when he meets with you to discuss the planning of your party.

For more information on how you can make your party the most successful event of the year, call Shelley Miller at 481-1034.

Top service, great prices found at Lingerie Lines

The owners of Lingerie Lines, 126 Cartwright Ave., (across Dufferin from Yorkdale), are committed to personal service, good prices and a large variety of underwear, sleepwear, socks and hoisery.

Since the store opened more than three months ago, Ivonne and Danny Ben-Tsur's philosophy has been that their customers' needs is their prime concern. "We carry sizes from 32A right up to 52DD and we are always willing to order something if we don't have it in stock. We really do offer something for everyone," says Ivonne.They even carry your favorite Buffalo lingerie shop merchandise.

Personal, attentive service is important when you buy lingerie and no one knows that better than the people at Lingerie Lines. "There is always coffee brewing and when someone comes in we take all the time she needs to choose what she wants and be fitted properly. If the customer is looking for a present, we can ask a few questions and help choose the proper gift. We stand behind all our merchandise and are always willing to exchange for a different item," Ivonne says.

Sexy gowns

Danny and Ivonne know how important it is for someone buying lingerie to have the use of private, comfortable change rooms, and in designing the store, they chose curtains that go from floor to ceiling, cozy chairs and proper mirrors. "Being comfortable is such an important part of the shopping experience, and we do our best to put our customers at ease," says Ivonne.

One-piece garments

Variety at Lingerie Lines is staggering, and with everything from teddies, camisoles, sexy gowns, flannel nighties and terry robes to shimmering stockings and even aerobics wear, there is something for every taste and every budget. "We carry such lines Natori lingerie, Hue socks and stockings and a number of very popular American lines. The colors are vibrant reds, pastel pinks, basic black and everything in between. Choosing from the vast number of items may be the only problem our customers have," she says.

Brides are important at Lingerie Lines and items such as the merry widow, a one-piece garment worn underneath a gown comes in a variety of styles and in sizes right up to 46DD. "Lacy, sexy negligee sets and gowns are great for a romantic honeymoon," Ivonne says.

Redstone Pictures: new excellence in video productions

Redstone Pictures is a video production company dedicated to the excellence of special event videography. Redstone specializes in Weddings, Bar/Bat Mitzvahs and family parties.

Redstone's trademarks are state-of-the-art equipment and experienced staff trained to capture the special memories of your celebration.

Redstone carries a full complement of BETA-CAM and SVHS professional video equipment. Our professional editing suite features a 2600 color graphics centre, Digital Video Effects (DVE), eight-channel sound mixing and a host of support equipment that combine to guarantee the finest sound and picture reproduction.

Completely customized

Redstone's graphics department also customizes backgrounds and graphics. Logos or graphics from invitations, for example, can be used in the background of the video.

Redstone believes high quality sound is of the utmost importance. They offer wireless microphones and while taping they run two audio channels to guarantee perfect sound.

Reflects taste

It is our belief that the equipment is only as good as the people who operate it. Redstone's staff is headed by Richard Saunders. Each member of Redstone's staff shoots and edits so that the final product will maintain the spirit and joy of your celebration. This personal attention insures that your video will be unlike any other and will reflect your family's taste and values. Redstone is proud to encourage you to participate in the production of your video in order to add a "personal touch."

We understand that the moments of your special events are priceless. Redstone's goal is 100 per cent customer satisfaction. Our work is not finished until you are completely satisfied.

Innovative menus by Jacobs

Since 1989, hundreds of Toronto's private and organizational simchas have benefitted from the partnership of the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation and Jacobs Catering Ltd.

The Synagogue is an elegant facility incorporating over 11,000 square feet of space for the community's wide range of catering needs.

Since it's inception, the synagogue has played host to major dinners and events sponsored by such organizations as Israel Bonds, Bnai Brith, Yad Vashem, Ner Israel Yeshiva, Canadian Jewish Congress, Eitz Chaim schools and others.

Jacobs Catering Ltd., with over 30 years of experience, continues to present new and innovative menu selections in all price ranges. The newest innovation is the addition of a full service dairy kitchen which can accommodate parties of up to 250 people in the synagogue's Sisterhood Hall.

Prepared by experienced chefs and served by courteous and helpful staff, their meat and parve menus are presented in the large main kitchen and can accommodate up to 1,000 guests in the synagogue's main ballroom.

The synagogue urges all interested parties to arrange an appointment to visit and discuss your upcoming catering needs. Please call for more information 886-3832.

Facilities & Service Second to None!

Your very special day deserves the finest in cuisine and service. You can rely on our proven record of quality for all your catering needs. Experienced chefs and courteous staff insuring an enjoyable worry-free affair by attending to your every detail. Beautiful and spacious facilities – including a skylight Chupah and a landscaped outdoor Chupah garden – accommodating from 50 to 1000 guests.

Salon has gowns for plus-size brides

Jackqueline Hope, president of Big, Bold and Beautiful, has proven that fashion needn't be sacrificed for size.

Hope, herself a glamorous plus size, began Big, Bold and Beautiful — a salon for women size 16 to 30 +, after a humiliating search for a wedding gown.

"Buying a wedding gown is one of the most exciting times for a woman and it's possibly one of the most expensive dress she will buy in her life. A bride should be treated very special."

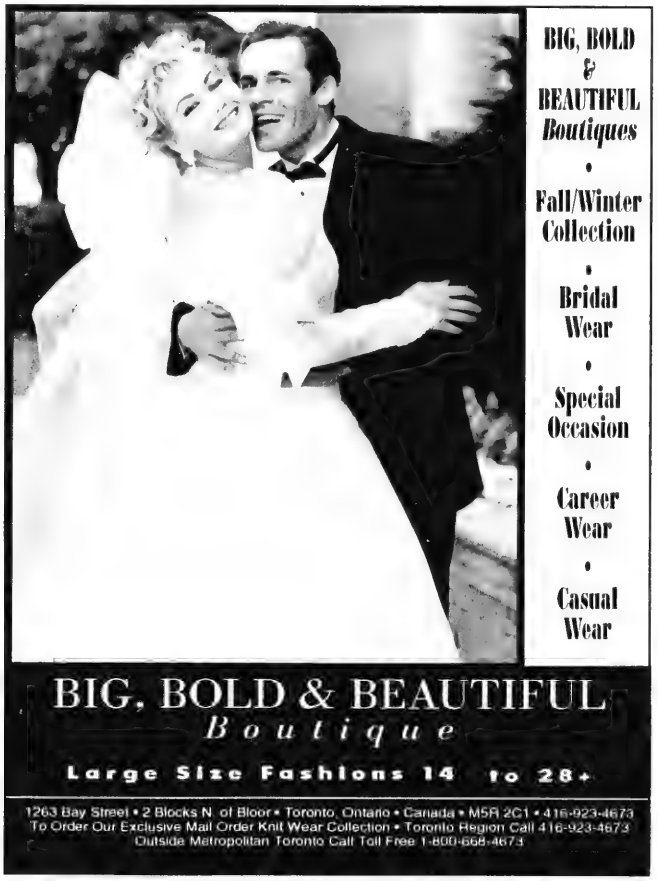
Styling is the key when designing a plus-size gown and no one knows better than Hope what flatters a bride and what just won't work.

"The most popular style is a waist that drops to a V in the front. It really slims the hip line, makes the bodice look longer and proportions the figure better.

"With their round, fleshy shoulders, neck and chest, plus-size women look very pretty in V-neck or off-the-shoulder styles."

She says brides coming into her salon are afforded luxuries not available at other bridal shops — for plus sizes.

"When I looked for my gown all I could do was hold small-size dresses up in front of me and guess how they would fit. At Big, Bold and Beautiful, however, women have the opportunity to try on several gowns and they have access to personal consultations with knowledgeable staff, private change rooms, a relaxed atmosphere and best of all, the ability to try on a dress that zips up in the back."



A La Carte Photography: a new way to buy

Although A La Carte Photography is a new company, its owner, George Evashuk, has photographed weddings since 1979.

"I launched A La Carte Photography so that brides, grooms and their families would have a new way of purchasing classical and modern styles of photography," he says.

"I noticed that couples often were not satisfied with ordinary 'package photography' and also disliked the high pressure sales tactics that bumped them up to costlier packages. With the a la carte approach, my clients buy only what they want and need. High pressure sales have no place in A La Carte Photography.

"I saw a niche I could fill that satisfies a common need and so far the response has been everything I hoped for. It is exciting to see this concept being accepted by today's consumers."

Besides photographing weddings, George is also a commercial photographer, photojournalist and portrait photographer. He believes this depth of experience is necessary for a modern wedding photographer to provide a couple with the pictures they want.

"I'm especially glad to see the renaissance of black-and-white portraiture," George says.

"What most people don't realize is that the dyes used in color prints are organic materials and will decompose. In other words, all color prints are going to fade eventually. I provide an archivally processed black-and-white print that should not exhibit any noticeable fading for over a century."

The eternityline is what George calls his archival prints. "What's the use of spending a lot of money on color portraits of your wedding, if they're going to fade away in 15 years or so?

"The Eternityline is also an excellent medium for portraits of bar mitzvah boys and bat mitzvah girls and other milestone events," George says.

He does shoot weddings in color but also creates original black and white portraits of the couple.

"A lot of guys get black-and-white prints made from color negatives but none of them have the range and quality that you get with original black-and-white film."

The Reportage style of wedding photography is also something George offers. He shoots black and white or color in a pure candid style. One of his sample albums shows the groom shaving in the bathroom, the guys trying to figure out how the buttons and suspenders work on their tuxedos, and the bride who slipped away from all the activity to spend a quiet moment in her parents' bedroom. Nothing is posed.

"The Reportage style is an addition to the classical look I try to create," George says.

Having seen various styles come and go, George believes there is an enduring place for a classical style that has a timeless character, especially for his portraits.

"A beautifully posed and lit portrait of the bride and groom with emotion, drama and impact will hold its appeal long after one gets tired of looking at yourself superimposed in a brandy glass, don't you think?"

George Evashuk

But there is more to wedding photography than pictures. A La Carte Photography is, after all, a business.

"The business of A La Carte Photography is to create satisfied clients and the means to do this is with superior service," he says.

"My market research shows that the priority couples use in choosing a photographer is confidence, quality, then service. Price is actually the fourth consideration," George says. "There will always be photographers cheaper than me and plenty who are more expensive, too.

"I strive to give my clients the kind of service I believe they deserve for placing their confidence in me. If the personal service I provide in combination with the best photography I can do means that my clients come back to me later for family portraits or refer me to their friends, then to me that's a mark of earned success. And I will cherish it."

Beverly Hills Caterers makes "California dreamin'" a Toronto reality: you've never had glatt kosher so good!

When Raphy Amar brought his sterling reputation and wealth of experience from L.A. to Chopstix and Beverly Hills Caterers, he was confident that he could inject new life into the Chopstix kitchen and put a fresh face on simcha menus.

The response, however, so far exceeded his expectations that he now finds himself "shvitzing" to fill the rush of orders that have poured in since he came on board.

Beverly Hills Caterers will produce your affair at fine hotels like the Toronto Airport Marriott

Through the pages of the Canadian Jewish News, Raphy invited the Toronto Jewish community to sample his exciting new dining concepts with the slogan "REDISCOVER CHOPSTIX."

Rediscover it they did. A flood of familiar faces, together with a lot of newcomers, came out to see what this California boy was made of. Was he the "real deal" or was he just "California dreamin'?"

The California influence

They discovered that he had much more to offer than his wit, charm and a California tan. An international buffet consisting of Chinese, Moroccan, and Italian dishes was an instant hit and has become a Chopstix mainstay. Another runaway success is the revamped regular menu, which now includes the lighter fare typical of California cuisine: fabulous salads fashioned from every fruit and vegetable under the sun, splendid pasta dishes, and a wide assortment of tasty low-cholesterol and macrobiotic dishes that are becoming de rigueur in an increasingly health-conscious world.

A salad isn't just a salad

Salads are a specialty. A variety of lettuces including arrugala and raidiccio, together with the appropriate light vinaigrettes, can make salad a highlight of the meal as opposed to an afterthought. The California influence reaches right through the menu to the desserts, where light and lovely creations prove that what's good can be good for you too.

All this and more is now available for your simchas. Give Raphy the keys to your wedding and he'll bring it home beautifully without denting the budget.

With the creative flair that earned him accolades as the exclusive caterer to Beth Jacob (L.A.'s largest orthodox synagogue), Raphy will create a menu that will surprise and delight everyone.

"Any caterer can play it safe and go with the status quo," says Raphy. "We prefer to create an original menu for every customer. Our job is not just to prepare food correctly and tastefully, but to make each simcha an original dining experience that everyone will remember for years."

In Los Angeles, where he catered to the broadest cross-section of L.A.'s Jewish community, he was always on fire to impress guests with new and intriguing menus–especially since movie stars were often in attendance at his functions. But a true chef "will go all out for everyone, not just the rich and famous," says Raphy. "At your simcha, you are the star. Whether you're rich or poor, you deserve the best, and that's exactly what we'll give you. Our motto is "be a guest at your own simcha."

The public's response has been so gratifying that Raphy would like to personally thank his customers, neighbours, and friends for "welcoming me to the city and making me feel at home. They have given a new meaning to the word 'menschkeit'".

Free tasting sessions

One service Beverly Hills Caterers provides that many don't is free tastings. During these tasting sessions, you can sample items from a prospective menu and get a better feel for what you're ordering before you decide. "A lot of people would like to experiment with the menu, but are afraid to take the risk," says Raphy. "Our tasting sessions allow you to be a little more adventurous. We take the risk out of risk-taking."

Raphy emphasizes that even if you don't want to try something totally new, he and his staff can give almost any traditional dish a new twist to enhance it without changing its essential character.

Speaking of staff, Raphy prides himself on employing "only the best people, and we make everything fresh in our own kitchen. Nothing is brought in from outside." This total control, he feels, is essential to ensure that only the best goes on your table.

Beverly Hills Caterers will cater your simcha under strict supervision at the finest hotels and banquet halls in Toronto, such as the Toronto Airport Marriott Hotel. Arrangements are being made with respected establishments "in the four corners of the city" so that you and your guests will never have to travel far to enjoy the Beverly Hills experience.

Raphy recommends that you begin planning your wedding a year in advance, and will be happy to personally assist you. You can reach him at 787-0345.

Regal Kosher Caterers' recipe for wedding success is joy-full and worry-free!

Regal Kosher Caterers takes pride in catering to weddings. Delicious glatt kosher cuisine and an elegant room in the beautifully renovated Montecassino Place Hotel are only the "tip of the iceberg".

Regal can also provide a wide range of services that ease the stress and strain of preparing for the big day.

If you want Regal to help you plan the event, order your flowers, decorate the room, book the photographer and the entertainment, they will be pleased to take care of it all. Professional staff will be there on your wedding day to make sure everything runs smoothly, leaving you free to relax and enjoy the company of family and friends.

A variety of rooms at the Montecassino, tastefully decorated in rich but subdued tones and softly lit with graceful chandeliers, are available for parties large and small. The largest room can accommodate up to a thousand guests.

There are four fabulous international menus to choose from: Italian, Chinese, Middle Eastern and Continental. Party planners, however, need not be restricted by the menu. The kitchen is always happy to accommodate special menu requests, and has the expertise to carry it off – from appetizers through the main menu to the desserts.

Elegant dining room at Montecassino Place Hotel

There are, in fact, countless mouth-watering desserts, baked on the premises, to choose from.

All the food is freshly prepared by the experts in the Montecassino's newly rebuilt state-of-the art kitchen. The kitchen is under the permanent supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Your out-of-town guests can stay at the Montecassino for exceptionally reasonable prices. Booked in advance, the overnight/weekend package costs only $60 per night, including taxes and a complimentary kosher breakfast.

The Montecassino Place Hotel is an ideal spot not onlly for weddings, but also for bar or bat mitzvahs, shabbatons, or any special occasion. Several memorable affairs held there in recent months have firmly established the hotel's reputation as a simcha destination of choice.

Conveniently located at Chesswood and Sheppard, the hotel is a stone's throw away from Sheppard and Bathurst, with easy access to the 401 and the Allen Road.

Groups large and small given equal care

Though Regal is well-equipped to handle large affairs, "no party is too small, and everyone we serve will be personally looked after," says Rabbi A.J. Eisenberger, a partner in the firm.

Wok N Deli now open in Spring Farm!

If you want to dine out, Regal Kosher Caterers invites you to the Wok 'N Deli. Recently opened by the same ownership, the Wok 'N Deli is a glatt kosher restaurant in the Spring Farm Marketplace at Clark and Hilda.

Restaurant patrons will enjoy a festival of choices in a spanking new dining room. Ash-gray tile, sky-blue trim and chrome fittings give a big-city feel, but down-to-earth prices will allow the whole family to enjoy fabulous glatt kosher dining at a fraction of what you might expect. For example, a complete Chinese dinner that feeds six is available for under $50.

Appetizers include spring rolls, spicy Thai noodles and salads.

Individual diners who want Oriental cuisine can select from several tempting main dishes starting at $6.95.

The deli side of the restaurant offers soup, corned beef and pastrami sandwiches, and on the lighter side, a chicken avocado club. With your deli meal, fresh cut French fries (regular or spicy hot), onion rings and more can be ordered on the side.

The Wok 'N Deli's continental menu features several tempting entrées, including Scallopine of Veal Marsala, fresh Atlantic Salmon, and barbecued back ribs glazed in a special sauce.

Among the scrumptious desserts are frozen Kahlua cake, lemon mousse cake, and chocolate decadent cake.

The Wok 'N Deli is open until 3 p.m. each Friday for those who want to take out Shabbos meals and specialty items, including cholent, schmaltz herring, chopped liver, chicken soup, cabbage rolls, knishes and latkes.

The Montecassino – attractive outside, elegant inside

Catering to your every need

The Wok 'N Deli will accommodate all your catering needs "at your place or ours".

Rabbi Eisenberger emphasizes that smaller in-home catering orders and shiva meals will be handled with the same care and attention as large orders.

At your home you can focus on your guests while staff takes care of dinner (buffet style or individual servings). They set up everything and, if you decide on a sit-down dinner, they will serve the food. When the meal is over, dirty dishes are whisked away.

Regal Kosher Caterers is committed to offering the ultimate in glatt kosher cuisine at the Montecassino Place Hotel and the Wok 'N Deli. They can be reached at (416) 630-0303.

Israel, PLO resume talks

JERUSALEM (JTA) — While Israelis and Palestinians have agreed to resume their talks, the two sides are offering widely varying estimates of how long it will take to reach an agreement.

Breaking a 10-day deadlock in their talks, Israeli and PLO negotiators said five negotiators from each side will meet daily, beginning this past Monday, at the Sinai border town of Taba until they resolve all the issues facing them.

But how long that will take depends on who is making the estimate.

Israeli ministers, after a briefing by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin at the weekly cabinet meeting Sunday, predicted it would take up to two months of intensive talks to resolve the two sides' differences.

"There are literally hundreds of issues to be dealt with," one cabinet source said.

But Nabil Sha'ath, the chief PLO negotiator in Taba, told reporters the negotiations could be completed in two to three weeks.

Environment Minister Yossi Sarid, a member of the Israeli negotiating team in Cairo before the talks deadlocked, dismissed Sha'ath's estimate as wishful thinking.

"If he turns out to be right, I'll be the first to applaud," Sarid said. "But better to be realistic than overoptimistic."

Considerably more is at stake than which estimate will turn out to be right.

Six or eight more weeks of negotiations might mean that the two sides could miss their next deadline — April 13 — when, according to the self-rule accord the two sides signed last September, Israel is scheduled to complete troop withdrawals from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho.

Moreover, protracted Israeli-Palestinian negotiations could upset the carefully laid U.S. plans to reactivate in the coming weeks the Israeli-Syrian negotiations, which have been stalled for months.

U.S. President Bill Clinton is scheduled to meet in Geneva on Jan. 16 with Syrian President Hafez Assad, who for many years was regarded in Washington as an inveterate hard-liner and a supporter of regional and international terrorism.

The United States is not yet ready to embrace Assad. But the meeting between the two leaders is regarded by both sides as a potential turning point.

Syria, bereft of a superpower backer after the fall of the Soviet Union, is anxious to win the favor of the American government.

The United States is determined to follow an Israeli-PLO accord with an Israeli-Syrian pact that would hold out the promise of long-term stability in the Middle East.

The big question, Rabin was reported as telling the cabinet, is whether the Syrian leader will speak clearly with Clinton about his concept of peace with Israel.

Settlements do not enhance security, Rabin tells Congress

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin described Jewish settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza as a security burden, but reiterated his promise not to uproot any settlement during the five-year interim period of Palestinian self-rule.

The prime minister was addressing the Canadian Jewish Congress National Executive at a meeting in his office last week.

Rabin said the existence of Jewish settlements in densely-populated Arab areas "does not contribute to Israel's security. The opposite is true.

"The main mission of the Israel Defence Forces in the territories is to fight terrorism. But unfortunately more than a third of our forces cannot act offensively against terrorism because they have to spend their time at settlements, escorting 600 groups of students to and from school," Rabin said.

"Stories that the government is limiting IDF activities in the territories are lies," charged the prime minister. "In fact, we have changed the laws so as to allow the IDF more freedom to act against terrorism."

Twice in his speech, Rabin portrayed Jewish settlements as economically unviable. He called the settlements in Judea and Samaria "bedroom communities," whose residents sleep in the terroritories but work in Jerusalem or Tel Aviv.

He charged that the 5,000 Jewish settlers in the Gaza Strip "cannot run their lives without employing up to 1,500 Palestinians." The government, he added, recently allowed the settlers in Gush Katif to employ an additional 500 farm laborers from Thailand "because no Israeli would agree to work for the wages that the settlers pay."

Rabin reiterated his opposition to "pouring money into settlements," maintaining that they do not enhance Israel's security.

But he was adamant about keeping all settlements in place during the course of the five-year interim agreement.

He noted that the residents of Dugit, a small fishing village in the Gaza Strip, recently asked the government to re-locate their settlement. Rabin said he had turned down the request because he did not wish to create a precedent of uprooting settlements.

The prime minister did not refer directly to the fate of the settlements in the long term, but said he would not like to repeat the precedent of the Camp David peace accord, in which Israel returned all lands captured from Egypt.

He reiterated his commitment to a united Jerusalem, noting that this is one of the conditions of the Declaration of Principles with the Palestinians.

Rabin said he hoped that Jericho — and not Jerusalem — would one day be the centre of the Palestinian administration. He noted that in the Camp David provisions for Palestinian autonomy, Bethlehem was suggested as an administrative centre.

"But I prefer Jericho," said Rabin, "because it is farther from Jerusalem and farther from Israeli towns and settlements."

Rabin hinted that Israel's readiness to implement the September peace agreement in all of Judea and Samaria would depend on the PLO's ability to exert its authority in the Gaza Strip.

"Before we continue, we would like to see how Arafat will manage in Gaza. We are committed to continue, but in phases. What happens in Gaza will serve as a test of the PLO's ability to maintain law and order."

He also said that "if something goes wrong," an agreement with the Palestinians could be "changed" more easily than an agreement with another Arab country.

"The Palestinians represent less of a threat to the future of Israel than anyone else in the Middle East," declared Rabin, noting that 85 per cent of Israel's defence budget goes towards preparing Israel to win a war against Arab and Islamic countries in the region.

"We don't need F-15 and Phantom jets against the Palestinians. They are not a threat to the very existence of Israel."

Rabin said Hezbollah forces in Lebanon were far more capable and better equipped than all the Palestinian terror groups combined.

Regarding negotiations with Syria, the prime minister said Israel would not sign an interim agreement with Damascus that falls short of a peace accord.

Unless Syria agrees to a peace treaty with Israel — as opposed to a non-belligerency agreement — "there will be no withdrawal [from the Golan Heights] at all," said Rabin, reiterating that the extent of the IDFs withdrawal would depend on the nature of peace proposed by Syria.

The prime minister acknowledged his concern over the lessening of support for the accord on both the Israeli and Palestinian sides.

"But I am determined to go on as long as I have a majority in the Knesset," he said.

Sharon may seek Israel's top office

JERUSALEM (JPFS) — Likud MK Ariel Sharon may run for prime minister in the next elections, he announced last week.

Sharon, who was in Toronto this week for a community address in support of Jewish settlers in the territories, told Israel television just prior to leaving that he had not made up his mind but that the possibility of his running exists.

The next elections, scheduled for November, 1996, will be the first to feature a direct vote for prime minister. If Sharon runs, he will bring to at least three the number of right-wing challengers to Labor.

Apart from Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, Tsomet's Raphael Eitan has also declared his candidacy.

Sharon has been unrelenting in his attacks on Netanyahu. He began last week with caustic comments about Netanyahu's leadership and continued with a demand for a new party primary, an undisguised bid to replace Netanyahu.

Until such a primary, Sharon suggested, a team ought to run the party.

Sixteen-year old Steven Berenstein plays the guitar for his parents, Barry and Sybil Berenstein.

Berensteins retain hope in fighting Tourette's

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like many of us, Sybil Berenstein read an interesting article in a magazine some ten years ago, cut it out and tucked it away for reference. Little did she know that that article would be the first step in helping her son Steven cope with Tourette Syndrome.

Tourette Syndrome is a neurological or neurochemical disorder, characterized by tics — involuntary, rapid, sudden movements that occur repeatedly in the exact same way. Tics may be motor, such as eye blinking or facial grimacing; or vocal, such as throat clearing, barking noises, or sniffling. Often, several occur simultaneously.

There may also be more complex tics, such as biting oneself, jumping, or performing tasks in a ritualistic way. Symptoms one tends to think of with Tourette Syndrome, although by no means are they universal, are coprolalia (vocalizing socially unacceptable words) or echolalia (repeating a sound, word or phrase).

These tics may happen many times a day, nearly every day or intermittently. There is a periodic change in the number, frequency, type and location of tics, and a waxing and waning of severity. Symptoms can disappear for weeks or months at a time, and then reappear.

"Involuntary" is not a totally accurate description, explained Barry Berenstein, Steven's father. There is some measure of control, particularly when the person is very involved in some other task.

However, the urge to perform these tics doesn't go away. Sybil compared it to an itch — you can try not to scratch, or not to think about it, but eventually you just have to scratch it.

Another complicating factor is that Tourette is sometimes associated with other disorders, such as obsessive compulsive traits, hyperactivity and/or attention deficit disorder, learning disabilities, behavioral problems (not surprising for children who have to cope with their sometimes bizarre symptoms in what may be a less than sympathetic environment) or sleep disorders.

There is no cure, although there may be a remission of symptoms.

Because the symptoms, when mild, resemble nervous habits, some people never are diagnosed, and may go through life not knowing they have Tourette.

The Berensteins, however, partly as a result of the article Sybil had read, and partly because Steven's tics were becoming worse, realized there was a definite problem, and began the long effort to help their son, who is now 16.

"If it hadn't been for that article, we wouldn't have known [he had Tourette] and we would have been on his case all the time," Sybil said.

Steven was taken to doctors, pediatricians and neurologists, and finally to Dr. Arthur Shapiro in New York, who had done much of the pioneering work in dealing with this disorder.

Eventually, he was put on medication, which helped control his symptoms.

Medication is not the final answer, however. There is no particular drug for Tourette Syndrome, so physicians use symptom-related drugs designed for other ailments such as Parkinson's Disease. Unfortunately, a drug for one symptom may interact badly with another drug, or while controlling one tic, may cause another to increase in frequency or severity.

The drugs themselves also have side effects.

It is a constant balancing act to control dosage, type of drug and frequency of medication.

But there are other problems associated with Tourette Syndrome, and the Berensteins have coped with many of them.

Teachers and school administrators may not believe that the children have a genuine problem, and may decide that they could control their actions if they just tried hard enough. This puts extra stress on the children, which, in a vicious circle effect, makes the tics worse.

The Berensteins felt that the double load at a Hebrew Day School worsened Steven's condition, so they moved him to a public school.

As his symptoms worsened and became more and more noticeable, fellow students teased him cruelly and, often encouraged by their parents, refused to play with him.

Eventually, Steven was sent to a small school in Madison, Conn., where he flourished. Part of the cost was borne by the Ontario health insurance system.

But with the recent cutbacks in out-of-country OHIP benefits, that option became impossible, and Steven returned here, where he attends Metro Prep, an alternative school in Toronto. Coping with the situation was difficult for the whole family, including Steven's two sisters, Tara, 21 and Ilana, 19.

The Berensteins became involved with the Tourette Syndrome Foundation of Canada (Barry is now national president, while Sybil is president of the Toronto Chapter). They have been involved in fundraising, counselling and being counselled, education and support groups.

Symptoms begin at young age

"We compared ideas, we networked, we learned how to cope. We didn't just sit and wait for something good to happen," Sybil said.

Dr. Paul Sandor, director of the Tourette Syndrome Clinic at the Toronto Hospital, Western Division, explained that symptoms typically become worse with psychological stress or excitement, and begin at a young age, perhaps six or seven, wax and wane over time.

There is a good deal of research being done now on Tourette Syndrome, particularly on genetic and drug aspects and family dysfunction. A new topic of research, Sandor said, is the effect of biofeedback on symptoms.

Parents who are concerned that their child might have Tourette should talk to their family doctor and arrange for a referral to a specialist or to his clinic, Sandor recommended.

The Berensteins are working hard to support the services of the Tourette Syndrome Foundation of Canada and to encourage research. But, as it always does in families, it comes down to what Sybil Berenstein dreams for Steven: "I want to see my child living a normal life."

For more information on Tourette Syndrome, call 968-2009.

'94 UJA campaign reports best results

TORONTO — United Jewish Appeal is projecting a $40.5 million campaign total for 1994. That would make it the best campaign year yet.

Last year, UJA raised $38.4 million.

The new Challenge Fund is being credited for the 1993 record results. The fund matches gift increases, which campaign workers said this year came from those in the hi-tech, investment, food and hospitality and entertainment divisions. The Challenge Fund's share of the final tally will be about $4 million.

"This year's response shows why Toronto's Jewish community is so special," said campaign director Mark Gryfe. "Despite troubled economic conditions, contributors realize that Jewish needs don't just disappear. In fact, in the current climate, they have increased considerably."

Half of UJA's net proceeds are sent to Israel and half are designated for community use, like subsidies for parents at Jewish day schools and financial assistance, through the Jewish Family & Child Service, for families facing economic difficulty.

In Israel, UJA funding supports the Jewish Agency. Last year, the Jewish Agency rescued 800 Jews living in Sarajevo and brought them to Israel. The Agency has also set up a comprehensive aliyah network in the former Soviet Union and other trouble spots.

Although campaign activities have wound down, UJA is still taking donations: $12 million in cash contributions came through in December alone.

The 1994 campaign is being chaired by Lawrence Bloomberg and Lawrence Fein. UJA fundraising efforts are supported by 30,000 contributors and 2,000 volunteers.

University friends mark 50th

MONTREAL — The Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem will celebrate its 50th anniversary with a nostalgic evening May 18 on the theme From Generation to Generation.

Appropriately, the chair is Carol Koffler, whose late parents Louis and Adele Bloom were among that small group of mostly Montrealers who founded the Friends here in 1944. Today, she and her husband Reuven continue the family tradition of support for "the university of the Jewish people," which turns 75 this year. They were actually married at Hebrew University by its vice-president Bernard Cherrick, an ordained rabbi, and their son Daniel studied there.

Serving as honorary adviser for the affair is Neri Bloomfield, who along with her late husband Bernard, have been major benefactors of the university. She now sits on its board of governors. Her late parents Lazar and Marguerite Margulis were also among the founding Friends group, whose first president was the late Allan Bronfman.

Allan's son Edward Bronfman is honorary chair of the event. Robert Kleinman will emcee.

The Canadian Friends was only the second such organization, and followed the initiative of a British group formed to raise funds and, above all, make the community more aware of Hebrew University.

Started in Montreal, the Friends rapidly grew into a truly national organization thanks largely to its partnership with Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, which functioned as the women's division.

Jewish immigration experts to review Refugee Board

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal government has tapped two prominent Jewish immigration experts to come up with suggestions on how the Immigration and Refugee Board can be improved and streamlined.

The announcement came not long after Ottawa appointed Michael Schelew, an ardent refugee advocate and chair of B'nai Brith Canada's committee for Syrian Jewry, to a seven-year term as deputy chair of the board.

In the meantime, Susan Davis, national executive director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), and Toronto immigration lawyer Lorne Waldman have until March 14 of this year to report to Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi on how the board, set up in 1989 to decide who enters Canada as a bone fide refugee, can be shorn up.

Waldman, a longtime vocal proponent of board reform, and Davis have been asked to look at three specific areas of the board's work: the so-called post-determination refugee claimants in Canada class, the humanitarian and compassionate review process and appeals of board decisions.

As things now stand, there is no appeal of board decisions based on the facts of a case, Davis told The CJN. She said she and Waldman will examine whether there is a "an efficient and fair way" to design an appeal based on facts.

Davis said less than one per cent of refugee claimants are accepted under Canada's humanitarian and compassionate review process, a review of claimants denied convention refugee status. She hinted she would like to see that number increase.

Michael Schelew

As well, the two-person commission will review ways in which visitors to Canada would be able to stay here if their native land is affected by sudden and unforeseen events, such as natural disasters or political upheaval.

Waldman has also been active in Canadian Jewish Congress's law and social action committee, which has produced several briefs on policies as they affect Jewish immigration.

The Immigration and Refugee Board has in the past few years come under fire, partly for the behavior of some of its appointees in deciding the fate of refugee claimants.

"As you are aware," Marchi wrote Davis and Waldman last week, "I am committed to a review of all aspects of the immigration program, and consultations on all aspects of immigration will be initiated shortly."

The minister asked for specific solutions that would reduce the need for his direct intervention in cases.

The study's overall thrust, Davis explained, will be the need to examine the plight of those who go before the board and are determined not to fit the definition of convention refugee, or one defined by the United Nations.

JIAS was also consulted recently in the naming of Schelew as the board's deputy chair.

His appointment was part of an overall house-cleaning at the board by Marchi, who named replacements for 28 Tory appointments — holdovers from the previous administrations.

All the new appointees have extensive backgrounds in refugee law and related issues.

The new appointments do not necessarily mean the board will become more liberal in its decisions, Schelew, 42, told The CJN.

"We will want to ensure that genuine refugees get the protection they deserve. The government cares about genuine refugees. I want [the board] to be perceived as being there to protect them," said Schelew, a former head of the Canadian section (English-speaking) of Amnesty International and a past president of the Canadian Council for Refugees.

B.C. shul to decide level of women's participation

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Congregation Emanu-El, the 130-year-old synagogue here which is the oldest one in continuous use in Canada, will take a vote of its congregants in March to decide if there should be full participation in religious activities by women.

At present, egalitarian services are held frequently in which men and women participate and women are given aliyahs as well as doing the reading from the Torah. Women often conduct the services when the rabbi is out of town.

April Katz, president of the congregation, says in a letter to members that the board of directors is recommending "full and equal participation of Jewish men and women in all aspects of Jewish spiritual life." She points out that there is a contradiction between counting women in the minyan, as is the practice of Emanu-El, "and yet not allowing full rights and responsibilities that derive from being part of the minyan."

Emanu-El is a Conservative congregation and Katz says the law committee of the Rabbinical Assembly, the governing body of Conservative rabbis, has given legitimacy through legal interpretation to full participation by women in religious services. She adds that there is full religious participation by women "in the majority" of Conservative movement synagogues today, and notes also that the Jewish Theological Seminary of America ordains women as rabbis.

Katz stresses that girls and boys here get the same training at the Hebrew school operated by the synagogue, and "a growing number of young women are trained during bat mitzvah preparation to take leadership roles in the service."

She says "there is a weekly need for skilled participation in leadership roles in the service which can in part be met by encouraging full participation by all our youth. The future of our community and of the Jewish people depends on the pride, commitment and knowledge of today's youth, regardless of gender."

A series of community meetings will be held during the next few weeks to discuss the situation and a decision will be made at a special general meeting on March 10.

Order of Canada announces honorees

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Irving Abella, president of Canadian Jewish Congress and history professor at York University, was appointed a member of the Order of Canada last week, as was Vancouver philanthropist Joe Segal, head of Kingswood Capital Corporation. They were among a half dozen Canadian Jews so honored.

"The accomplishments of these outstanding citizens are as diverse and as inspiring as the geography of the land," said Governor General Ramon Hnatyshyn in his tribute to the 80 honorees.

The Order was established in 1967 to recognize outstanding achievement and service in various fields of human endeavor.

Abella, who was named in the education category, was "very honored and gratified," he told the CJN. A noted expert on Canadian Jewry, Abella co-authored None is Too Many, an examination of Canada's policy of refusing to accept Jewish refugees from Nazi Germany, and authored A Coat of Many Colors, a history of Jews in Canada.

When interviewed last year in the CJN, Abella spoke of the importance of the Canadian Jewish community's playing a role in Canadian society on all issues. "I think I'd like it to be said that I made a difference," he said.

Segal, who was named in the business category, spends at least 40 hours a week supporting and advising community organizations. His assistance ranges from free rent for the Make a Wish Foundation, an organization for terminally ill children, to million-dollar gifts.

Segal, who was born in Vegreville, Alta., left school at age 15 and worked on building the Alaska Highway. He parlayed a small retail clothing store into a chain of 70 stores, which later merged with Zellers. When the Hudson's Bay Co. bought Zellers, Segal became the largest private shareholder of The Bay.

He left retailing in 1979 to form Kingswood. Some of his companies included Mr. Jax Fashions and Collegiate Sports.

A past president of Schara Tzedeck Congregation and of the Talmud Torah School Foundation, Segal was Israel Bonds Man of the Year in 1981 and the driving force behind the Hebrew Assistance Association to help financially distressed people. Last year, he was elected chancellor of Simon Fraser University.

Dr. Judith Hammerling Gold of Halifax was named in the health care category. The first Canadian to serve as president of the American College of Psychiatrists, she was also the first female president of the Canadian Psychiatric Association and the first woman to head a medical specialist association in Canada. She is a former chair of the board of Mount Saint Vincent University in Halifax.

"Through her involvement in professional organizations, she consistently encourages opportunities for women and students of disadvantaged minorities in higher education," said a release from Hnatyshyn's office.

Other members of the Canadian Jewish community being honored include Saul Cherniak of Winnipeg (in the politics category). Cherniak, a long-time NDP cabinet minister and member of the legislative assembly, who served as deputy premier of Manitoba, was instrumental in establishing the Security Intelligence Review Committee in 1984. His father, Alter Cherniak, was known as a leader in Yiddishist circles.

Montrealers Edith Della Pergola, who co-founded the Opera Studio at McGill University, and Arnold Steinberg, an executive with the former Steinberg grocery chain, were honored in the arts/music and voluntary service categories respectively. Steinberg is noted for his commitment to medical research as chair of the McGill University-Montreal Children's Hospital Research Institute.

Ungerman elected to Jewish Sports Hall of Fame

NEW YORK (Staff/JTA) — Colorful Canadian boxing promoter and manager Irving Ungerman is among 12 new inductees into the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame for 1994.

Ungerman joins eight Americans and three others from around the world who were elected last to the prestigious Hall of Fame, located on the campus of the Wingate Institute of Physical Education and Sport in Netanya, Israel.

"To me, it's a tremendous honor to have been chosen," Ungerman told The CJN. "There are people like Sandy Koufax in there."

Ungerman, 70, is no stranger to accolades. In 1975, he was the first person inducted into the Canadian Boxing Hall of Fame and he has served as honoree at the Toronto Jewish Community Centre's annual sports celebrity dinner.

One of Maccabi Canada's key fundraisers, Ungerman has also thrown his support behind other charitable causes, like the Reena Foundation, Mount Sinai Hospital and the Salvation Army.

But it is the manly art of pugilism that is his greatest claim to fame. From 1962-77, Ungerman served as manager for then Canadian heavyweight champion George Chuvalo and promoted memorable world title fights in the mid-1960s between Chuvalo and Muhammad Ali, and Chuvalo and Ernie Terrell.

Later, he managed boxer Clyde Gray, Canadian and Commonwealth champion, and in recent years, he obtained the exclusive Canadian rights to present closed circuit television coverage of top boxing matches.

More than 200 Jewish athletes, coaches and sports personalities representing 18 countries have so far been inducted into the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

Irving Ungerman

The eight Americans elected for 1994 are Olympic basketball gold medalist and pioneer sports broadcaster Sam Balter; NBA Hall of Fame basketball star Max Friedman; world featherweight and junior welterweight boxing champion Benny Bass; two-time Minnesota All-America quarterback Sigmund Harris; and U.S. Olympic head coaches Allen Rosenberg (rowing) and William Bachrach (swimming).

The four international honorees elected are South African rugby star Wilf Rosenberg; Czechoslovak world table tennis champion Traute Kleinova; Hungarian Olympic wrestling champion Karoly Karpati, and Ungerman.

The Hall of Fame also presents special Pillar of Achievement honors each year to recognize extraordinary contributions to the world of sports.

The 1994 Pillar of Achievement honors went to Fred Lebow, longtime director of the New York City Marathon, and Ben Olan, a sports writer for the Associated Press for 40 years.

Joe Siegman, a Maccabiah athlete and former chairman of the Hall of Fame, said the project to build a Jewish sports hall of fame began in 1977, when he and some friends attempted to name as many Jewish athletes as they could.

When they decided to hold a dinner "to raise awareness for the Macabbiah," many famous Jewish sports heroes attended, Siegman said, and right after that the idea for a Jewish sports hall of fame "took a life of its own."

Siegman said the main purpose of the Hall of Fame was to "draw attention that Jews do contribute to sports."

Salomon gets top Maccabi position

MONTREAL — Montreal businessman Roy Salomon was recently named national president of Maccabi Canada, succeeding Sid Greenberg of Toronto.

Salomon, 57, first became involved in Maccabi Canada in 1969 as a basketball team member. "When we marched into Ramat Gan Stadium for the opening ceremonies with 50,000 Jewish people looking on, [I thought] that for thousands of years people had tried to destroy us but here we were in Israel," said Salomon. "It was a very emotional experience and this feeling continues at every opening ceremony."

Salomon said the Maccabiah Games are more than an athletic event. "Every young Jewish athlete returns with a deeper sense of his or her Jewishness and intense positive feelings for Israel," he said. "We have received numerous letters from participants describing how their Jewish feelings and their love for Israel were intensified, and the bonds strengthened, thanks to this experience."

Salomon was national athletic committee chair of Maccabi Canada from 1981 to 1985 and captained the Canadian team in 1985. He most recently was executive vice-president of Maccabi Canada.

Roy Salomon

Maccabi Canada is one of 50 participating countries in the Maccabi World Union. Last July, Maccabi Canada's contingent of 200 athletes won 26 gold medals, 30 silver and 29 bronze. It was the 14th year for the Games, held every four years in Israel.

Salomon is involved in other areas of Jewish communal life as a member of Federation CJA's Combined Jewish Appeal team and through the Montreal YM-YWHA, where he is an officer and founding chair of the annual YM-YWHA Health and Heart Month. He also founded the sports Hall of Fame in 1979.

"We want to strengthen the ties between Maccabi Canada and the Y's and JCCs throughout Canada. Maccabi Canada depends on the Jewish Community Centres to be the development arm . . . to be a place where competitions and training programs can be offered to youngsters," he said.

In addition to the Israeli Maccabiah, more than 1,000 youth compete in the Pan American Maccabi Games. Another 3,000 participate in the semi-annual JCC North America Maccabi Youth Games, and thousands more in regional Maccabi Games.

"Most of all we want to continue to bring as many young Jewish people to Israel as possible. As the saying goes, 'It's two weeks to experience, a lifetime to remember.' "

Pratt & Whitney wins Israeli engine contract

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Pratt & Whitney Canada has been awarded a major contract to produce the engines for a new state-of-the-art executive jet being developed by Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI).

The Astra Galaxy corporate jet, to be completed by 1996, is designed to fly from eight to 19 passengers on nonstop trans-Atlantic flights.

IAI says the Astra Galaxy will be able to fly non-stop from Paris to New York at speeds not yet attained by any other long-range executive jet on the market.

There are still many details of the contract to be worked out with IAI, Pratt & Whitney Canada spokesperson France Poulin told The CJN from the company's Montreal headquarters last week.

The motors will be modified versions of Pratt & Whitney's PW305 turbo-fan engines, Poulin said, and may be produced at the company's Mississauga, Ont. plant.

The deal was praised by Ontario Premier Bob Rae, who was leading a business mission to Israel.

"This is great news for us. It means jobs," Rae said in Jerusalem.

The Russian Yakovlev Design Bureau is to supply the fuselage for the planes, IAI added.

"No engine selection for a business aircraft has been made with such care and deliberation," announced Shmuel Alkon, Corporate Vice President and General Manager of IAIs Aircraft Division. "The Pratt & Whitney engine offers the configurations and capabilities that allow us to optimize the Galaxy design."

The value of the deal was not made public since the companies are still negotiating details.

Pratt & Whitney and IAI have a long history of collaboration. Israel Aircraft Industries refurbishes the engines of Pratt & Whitney's civilian and military aircraft, including its F15s and Skyhawks.

The Canadian company was supposed to produce the engines for the Lavie fighter plane, a major IAI project that was subsequently cancelled.

The new Galaxy aircraft is to be marketed and supported by IAI's subsidiary, Astra Jet Corporation, headquartered in Princeton, N.J. The company now supports an international fleet of over 450 Astra and Westwind business aircraft.

Heritage Front's Droege gets his day in court

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The white supremacist Heritage Front is constantly on the hunt for new members and entices young people to join its ranks through rallies, racial rock concerts and media events, a Toronto court was told last week.

Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said he heard Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege discussing the organizations' activities on a radio interview this past summer that aired in Montreal.

Farber was testifying as an expert witness before a Provincial Court in a case in which Droege is facing charges of breaching terms of his bail.

The conditions of his release bar him from associating with the Heritage Front, the Church of the Creator or the Mountain Church. He was released from jail pending trial on assault charges stemming from a June street brawl in the College and Bathurst area of Toronto in which members of the Heritage Front clashed with anti-racist protesters. That case is scheduled to come before a different court later in the month.

Farber, who was recognized by the trial judge as an expert on the Heritage Front and hate groups, said the Front should not be mistaken for a fringe organization, but is an extremist group with links to neo-Nazis worldwide.

Farber told the CJN that Droege's lawyer introduced his client's criminal record into the court. That record includes U.S. convictions for attempting to take over the Caribbean island of Dominica, for air piracy (carrying a weapon on board a plane) and cocaine possession.

Testifying in his own behalf, Droege said that at the time he gave the radio interview in Montreal, he did not believe he was violating terms of his bail.

The trial adjourned for several days and is scheduled to resume this week.

Farber said the case is significant in that it marks the first time a Jewish professional active in investigating hate groups was recognized as an expert by an Ontario court.

Congress backs peace moves

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — The Canadian Jewish Congress wound up its national executive meetings in Israel last week declaring its support for the Rabin government's peace initiative.

During the week-long visit to Israel, the delegation, led by CJC President Irving Abella, met with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, as well as other Israeli leaders, academics, military experts and business people.

The delegation of 50 Canadians also toured the West Bank, where they spoke to Palestinian representatives and Jewish settlers.

Rabin told the CJC that no Jewish settlement would be uprooted during the interim phase of the agreement.

He also declared that Israel would not consider any withdrawal on the Golan Heights for anything short of full peace with Syria (see story, page 1).

Explaining the background to the latest crisis in negotiations with the Palestinians, Peres told the delegation that the PLO "would like to bring the interim agreement to the level of an independent state. This is something we will never agree to — for the time being."

In response to a question about whether Israel would insist on the right to pursue terrorists into areas under Palestinian self-rule, Peres replied: "If someone tries to kill us, no agreement will stop us from defending ourselves."

Asked whether Israel would welcome a visit by PLO chairman Yasser Arafat, the foreign minister expressed little enthusiasm. "I don't feel lonely in Jerusalem," he said.

Cabinet Secretary Elyakim Rubinstein praised the role Canada has played as host of the multilateral talks on refugees. He said he hoped Canada would "keep the right of [Palestinian] return — which is suicidal for Israel — off the agenda, and continue concentrating on admittedly small ways to help refugees in distress."

During their week in Israel, the CJC also met with Finance Minister Avraham Shochat, Absorption Minister Yair Tsaban, Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, Likud Member of Knesset David Levy, Canadian Ambassador Norman Spector and Ontario Premier Bob Rae, who was leading a business delegation on a trip to the Middle East.

While touring the West Bank, the CJC spoke with Palestinians in Ramallah and Jewish settlers in Beit El.

"We heard the case of the settlers presented passionately," remarked Abella. "But if Israelis have a chance for real peace — and I stress "real" — then I don't think the settlers will stand in their way."

Abella added that while the Israeli opposition to the government peace initiative is "very vocal, it has not provided any alternative.

"What we learned during our visit is that there is still commitment on the part of both the Israeli and Palestinian sides to see the agreement through. The signing of the Declaration of Principles gave us an exhilarating sense of possibility. Since then, the exhilaration has gone, but the possibility remains."

The CJN president said discussions in Israel confirmed the changing nature of Canada-Israel relations.

"The relationship is moving from the political to the economic realm. There is more emphasis now on trade deals than on influencing United Nations resolutions.

"I think that Canadian Jews will have to look for other ways to work for Israel besides the traditional ways of political lobbying and charity. Investment is the wave of the future. That is what Israelis want most from us."

New group opposes deal with Arafat

JERUSALEM (JTA) — At a time when many groups opposed to the Israel-PLO accord are struggling to get their views across to the public in Israel and abroad, one women's organization is conveying its message loud and clear.

Known as Women for Israel's Tomorrow, the group has proven adept at attracting media coverage at a time when events and demonstrations linked to the pact between Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat constantly vie for air time and headlines.

Inaugurated eight months ago by some 30 Jerusalem women who were opposed to territorial concessions to the Palestinians, the group has sprouted into an organization with 1,000 dues-paying members.

Thousands of sympathizers and supporters have also lined up behind the organization.

According to Ruth Matar, a founder and chair of Women for Israel's Tomorrow, the vast majority of the group's members live within Israel's pre-1967 borders.

"We're not settlers," she said. "We're ordinary Israelis who oppose the agreement between Rabin and Arafat."

This fact is important, Matar asserted, "because we represent the views of a growing number of Israelis."

Quoting recent opinion polls, which indicate that the majority of Israelis no longer support the accord, she said, "The tide of public opinion in Israel is turning, and our voice needs to be heard."

Matar said she and several like-minded friends, many of them originally from English-speaking countries, launched the organization "partly as an answer to the media's coverage of anti-government demonstrators."

"The media in Israel has traditionally portrayed anyone who demonstrates against concessions to the Arabs as settlers and right-wing fanatics," she said.

"That was especially true after Rabin and Arafat signed the agreement and hundreds of thousands of Israelis came out to demonstrate against it," she said. "There were at least 200,000 people at the largest rally, but Israel Television reported it as tens of thousands.

"The TV and newspapers also said that the vast majority of the demonstrators were settlers or religious people. That simply wasn't true," she said.

Matar, who emigrated from New York in 1977, said: "Israelis are eager to hear what we have to say. We're not anti-peace; we want a real peace that will not threaten the State of Israel.

"As wives, mothers, grandmothers, we have a special interest in attaining a real peace," she said.

The group has dubbed itself the Women in Green. Its members wear Kelly-green hats to demonstrate that they are opposed to returning to the so-called Green Line, Israel's borders before the Six-Day War.

Their nickname is a play on the name of the left-wing group Women in Black, whose members have been demonstrating every week since the start six years ago of the intifada, or Palestinian uprising, against Israel's occupation of the territories.

Since May 1993, members of Women for Israel's Tomorrow have staged weekly demonstrations, ranging from small vigils to large rallies throughout the country.

With chapters in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem, as well as in smaller communities such as Ra'anana and Petach Tikvah, the organizers are able to mobilize members in a particular region within a matter of hours.

The image of the group as being composed of mothers and grandmothers has often worked in the organization's favor, said Ruth Gregor, a 34-year-old member.

"Israelis are interested to see that women from all walks of life, especially those in their 60s and 70s, have come out to demonstrate," she said during a recent demonstration in front of the Foreign Ministry.

"Let's face it," she said with a laugh, "this is not your typical population of demonstrators."

Condition of Sephardi Jewry focus of GA panel discussion

The articles on this page previously appeared in French. They have been abridged.

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Sephardim of North America were not exactly pampered at the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations in Montreal last November. Of some 350 lectures, discussion workshops and round table sessions listed in the program, only one was devoted exclusively to Sephardi concerns.

The condition of Sephardic Jewry — perspectives from Canada, Morocco and Israel, was the central theme of this forum organized in close collaboration with Federation CJA of Montreal and the American Jewish Joint Distribution committee (JDC). Four guest speakers participated in the panel discussion moderated by Federation CJA executive vice president Steven Drysdale.

The first was Joseph Gabay, the president of the Communaute Sepharde du Quebec (CSQ). He sketched a brief history of the Sephardic community established in Quebec in the late '50s.

"In spite of the fact that, since 1976, it has been an integral part of the institutional network of the Montreal Jewish community, the CSQ has never been considered a branch of [the Federation]. On the contrary," Gabay insisted, "it has always strongly claimed the status of an entirely distinct community."

In his opinion, the current leadership of Federation CJA has shown itself to be receptive and more and more open-minded with regard to the official representatives of Sephardic Jewry in Quebec. "Today," he said, "the Sephardim feel they can consider themselves full-fledged members of the organized Jewish community of Montreal."

Avinoam Brog, director of the Van Leer Institute in Jerusalem, a private institute whose primary mandate is to work actively towards rapprochement between Jews and Israeli Arabs, as well as between the various ethnic groups making up Israeli society today, was the second panelist.

According to Brog, who specializes in issues involved in the integration of ethnic minorities into Israeli society, "the Sephardic problem in Israel has eased somewhat, but it has not completely disappeared."

"However," Brog noted, "the Sephardim of Israel have not yet made the grade. At the level of their socio-economic integration, there is still a great deal of work to do. It's at this level that the Sephardim of the Diaspora can play a leading role.

"The Israeli government can do virtually nothing more for those Sephardim who today make up the majority of residents of Israel's poorest cities. Their only alternative: go into business. You should help your Sephardic brothers, sisters and cousins in those cities to launch economic projects and selective investments," he suggested in a perceptibly condescending tone. The suggestion, which took the audience aback, provoked some snickering.

The third speaker was Simon Levy, secretary of the Jewish Community of Morocco. Levy reminded the 50 or so people who attended the panel that "Moroccan Jews have always been able to live as Jews with no constraint."

He believes that Moroccan Jewry does not represent only the approximately 10,000 Jews still living in Morocco. "Moroccan Jewry currently represents approximately 900,000 Moroccan Jews settled in the four corners of the globe. Their true roots are still in Morocco. One thing is certain, of two millennia of history on the hospitable soil of this country, a Judeo-Moroccan memory endures and has never been extinguished."

Following the presentations, Joseph Benarroch, president of the Federation Sepharade du Canada, who was visibly offended by some of Brog's allegations, was quick to respond that he had the distinct feeling he had "gone back 30 years into the past."

His tone grave, he told Brog, "This is all very unfortunate. If I understand correctly, nothing has changed in the approach to, and the way in which, certain Israeli spokespersons analyze the thorny question of how to integrate the Sephardim into Israeli society. However, I do not believe that those who are negotiating peace with the Palestinians and the Arab countries today, and who are going to cash in on the eventual economic dividends which may flow from this as yet hypothetical reconciliation, are the Sephardi residents of Dimona or the other development towns in the south of Israel. They, they will continue to struggle at the bottom of the ladder. . . ."

Benarroch urged the organizers of the G.A., as well as the executive of the Council of Jewish Federations, to reactivate a task force currently disbanded created at the 1979 G.A. in Montreal as soon as possible, in order to "examine seriously the real socio-economic problems which afflict the Sephardim of Israel and to propose some concrete solutions."

Rabin pays tribute to Morocco's Hassan II

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin paid a moving tribute to King Hassan II of Morocco during a press conference at the 62nd General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations of North America in November.

Rabin said that the Alawite monarch has always played a discreet yet leading role in the many attempts to bring about an Arab-Israeli rapprochement. This was more than likely one of the reasons for the totally unexpected lightning visit to Morocco by Rabin and his minister of foreign affairs, Shimon Peres, on Sept. 14, the day after Israel and the PLO signed the Declaration of Principles.

In October 1976, during his first tenure as prime minister, Rabin spoke secretly with Hassan II for the first time. Wearing dark glasses and a voluminous wig, the Israeli leader stayed in Morocco for 48 hours and discussed the war then raging in the Sahara with the king.

During his Montreal press conference, Rabin also emphasized that the great tolerance and respect shown by the Moroccan monarch towards the Jewish community still living in the Muslim country serves as an unprecedented example, unequalled in other Arab countries.

Asked if the purpose of his recent surprise trip was to pave the way for a possible establishment of diplomatic relations between Israel and Morocco, Rabin responded that it is "undeniable that normalization of our diplomatic relations with Morocco will not happen tomorrow. We are used to being patient. What is important is that we have always maintained excellent relations with the Moroccan authorities."

Although officially, there are neither diplomatic relations nor economic ties between the two countries, it is no secret that since the early 1980s, several thousand Israelis born in Morocco have been visiting their native land every year without hindrance. Moreover, Israeli experts are now working as advisers or technicians in Moroccan agriculture.

On Sept. 16, the highly respected French daily Le Monde reported that Koor Industries, the most powerful Israeli industrial conglomerate, which is controlled by the Histadrut, the central Labor trade union organization, holds numerous hidden interests in Morocco. After a secret trip last April, Koor executive director Benny Gabon reportedly received the support of Moroccan authorities to build a small-scale industrial complex somewhere in the south of the country. Furthermore, according to the Le Monde report, at the beginning of 1993, an Israeli farm produce company, Coop-Tzafon, received authorization from the Moroccan Ministry of Commerce to import a certain amount of Moroccan merchandise. In total, Le Monde reported, the economic exchange between the Jewish state and Morocco is about $100 million (U.S.) a year.

There are other ties between the two countries, on a human level. One of King Hassan's closest personal advisers is a brilliant Jewish Moroccan techocrat, Andre Azoulay, former chairman of the board of the powerful French financial group Paribas and founder of the World Union of Moroccan Judaism.

On Nov. 11, Serge Berdugo, president of the Jewish Community of Morocco, was named minister of tourism by King Hassan II.

Berdugo was supposed to participate in a panel discussion on the future of Sephardism at the General Assembly. His appointment forced him to cancel, and he was replaced at the last minute by one of his closest colleagues, Simon Levy, secretary of the Jewish Community of Morocco.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

CHERNIN — CHERNOS

I was fascinated by a story told by Cayle Chernin of Glace Bay, N.S. about a reunion with newly discovered family in Europe. The family originated near Minsk, in White Russia.

Chernin is a matronymic name (after a female ancestor) like Rivkin, Estrin, Dworkin, and Rachlin. Charna is a given name derived from the Russian word for black. It probably described a dark-haired girl. Golda was the given name of a blonde. Their descendants were Chernin or Goldin.

A variation of matronymic names comes from adding the suffix "es" instead of "in", as in Bayles and Sourkes. Hence the surname of my esteemed colleague Bernard Chernos.

U.S. pro-peace groups targetted with bombs

NEW YORK (JTA) — In an escalation of American Jewish opposition to Israel's peace accord with the Palestine Liberation Organization, bombs were left last week outside the Manhattan buildings that house the offices of Americans for Peace Now (APN) and the New Israel Fund.

Both organizations have long supported compromise with the Palestinians and have been virulently attacked by American Jews on the other end of the political spectrum.

The bomb outside the APN office was discovered by a building security guard, who called police. A half-hour later, an unknown caller notified police of the second bomb.

A police robot successfully defused the first device, but the bomb in front of the New Israel Fund exploded. It caused no damage, according to a police spokesman.

The spokesman said both bombs were low-level explosives in thermos-type containers, which were capable of causing serious injury or property damage. Both had timing devices.

According to the police, both bombs had handwritten notes that criticized the Israeli government for being too liberal. The notes were signed by multiple organizations, which the police would not identify.

According to one source, a note said that "the civil war has begun."

The incidents are being investigated by the Joint Terrorism Task Force of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the New York City Police Department.

A spokesman for the Israeli consulate in New York denounced the attack.

"The Israeli consulate vehemently condemns acts of violence or intimidation aimed at derailing the peace process. We remain confident that U.S. authorities will do their utmost to identify and prosecute the culprits to the fullest extent of the law," said the spokesman.

"The Israeli government will continue its efforts to achieve peace undeterred by such acts," he said.

APN has previously received bomb threats.

Both Jewish organizations were advised by the FBI not to comment on the case.

Nevertheless, the New Israel Fund issued a statement last week calling on the Jewish community "from all sides of the political spectrum" to condemn terrorist violence.

The NIF said it and APN were targeted by a "right-wing extremist Jewish organization opposed to peace in the Middle East."

Settlers meet with Rabin in bid to clarify their status

JERUSALEM (JTA) — Angry residents of a Jordan Valley settlement met with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last Thursday, demanding to know what their status will be once they are surrounded on three sides by an autonomous Palestinian region.

The 27 families of Na'ama, located about three miles north of the West Bank town of Jericho, have held a series of protests in recent days, blocking roads with burning tires and cars.

They claim the government is abandoning them by entering into a self-rule agreement with the PLO because it will make the settlement an island within PLO-controlled land.

The residents had been reassured earlier in the week by Deputy Defence Minister Mordechai Gur that they would remain connected to the rest of the country and that the nearby highway would be under the full control of Israeli security forces.

On Monday, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu told the settlers of Na'ama that any future government led by Likud would not be bound by the Palestinian self-rule accord signed last September in Washington.

Rabin told the settlers he would guarantee that the Jordan Valley would always remain Israel's eastern security border.

He also promised to increase security and economic aid for the agricultural settlement.

But he did not back down from Israel's peace initiatives, telling the group that the self-rule accord with the PLO presented Israel with an opportunity to achieve coexistence and peace.

In an incident in Jerusalem last week that underscored the challenges facing Israel, an Israeli soldier was stabbed in the city's French Hill neighborhood. The soldier received moderate wounds.

His assailant, a member of the rejectionist Islamic Jihad movement from the Gaza Strip, fled the scene with the soldier's weapon, but was later shot and killed by border police.

Two pamphlets found on him called for Palestinians to oppose the self-rule accord.

Arab countries continuing boycott of Israel: WJC

WASHINGTON (JTA) — Citing statistics compiled by the United States Commerce Department, the World Jewish Congress charged last week that Kuwait and Saudi Arabia have not abided by their pledges to stop participating in the Arab boycott of companies doing business with Israel.

The WJC said that Commerce Department figures show Kuwait made over 700 boycott-related requests to U.S. companies since June, when the Arab emirate announced it would stop its participation of the so-called secondary boycott of companies here and abroad doing business with the Jewish state.

WJC issued a statement urging Washington "to take immediate measures so that both Kuwait and Saudi Arabia live up to their pledges to put an end to their shameful compliance with the Arab blacklist."

The U.S. State Department said last spring that both countries had pledged to end their participation in the secondary boycott of Israel, which harms U.S. and other companies doing business with Israel.

Under U.S. law, if a participating country requests an American company to provide boycott-related information, the company must report such requests to the U.S. government.

In 1993, there were 8,660 such requests, mostly from Arab countries, reported by American companies, the WJC said.

Of the 8,660 requests, 2,011 were from Kuwait and 1,605 from Saudi Arabia, the group reported.

Efforts to end the primary Arab boycott of Israel and the secondary boycott of companies doing business with the Jewish state have taken on new urgency here in recent months.

U.S. officials from President Bill Clinton on down have spoken out against the boycott, with many calling it an anachronism that hurts the Middle East peace process.

In Canada, Prime Minister Jean Chretien has said Ottawa should pursue "normal" trade relations with Mideast countries.

But Arab countries have been reluctant to part with the longtime boycott, which has been in effect since before the 1948 founding of Israel.

The issue of Kuwait's participation in the secondary boycott has been a particularly sensitive one for some American officials because Washington came readily to Kuwait's defence against Iraq in the Persian Gulf War and many American lives were lost during the Gulf War.

Uzi Narkiss offers prescription for WZO

NEW YORK (JTA) — As Uzi Narkiss winds up 27 years with the World Zionist Organization, and a two-year stint heading its American office here, the retired general thinks it's time for the organization to change.

Narkiss believes that as the WZO moves toward its 1997 centenary, the organization founded to implement Theodor Herzl's vision of a Jewish state must shed some of its political structure and gear itself to ensuring a connection between Israel and the Diaspora.

"The State of Israel without the Diaspora is not the same Israel, and the Diaspora without Israel is not the same Diaspora," Narkiss said in a recent interview with JTA, as he prepared his new post as chairman of Israel's Coins and Medals Authority.

But the two communities could well drift apart, said Narkiss, and not only because of declining Jewish identity in the Diaspora.

Narkiss fears that in another decade, as Israel finds itself the largest single Jewish community in the world, it could grow less interested in Jews outside its borders.

Adding to his fear is the possibility that Israel's reaching peace with its neighbors could lead Israel to "become more interested with its Arab neighbors than with the Jews."

"I am very concerned that Israel will not turn, G-d forbid, Canaanite," said Narkiss, referring to an anti-Diaspora ideology that sought to create an Israeli identity rooted in the Middle East and separate from Judaism.

In the years just before and after the founding of the State of Israel, a group of intellectuals sought common cause with Arabs in forming a new culture. They were often disparaged as "Canaanites," pagans who lived in the land before being conquered by the biblical Israelites.

"The WZO has to take on itself, as its main goal, that Israel not turn into Canaan, and that the peace process not come between Israel and the Diaspora," he said.

Helping the Diaspora remain connected to Israel may be the easiest challenge.

"It's very possible that Israel will get much more involved in the Jewish community, sending more teachers to the Diaspora, ensuring that every Bar Mitzvah child will visit Israel," said Narkiss.

"All of these can be the mission of the WZO."

But how to help the Israelis is a more complicated question.

"The Jewishness (of Israelis) is that we live in Israel, go to the army, make a circumcision and say Kaddish," said Narkiss.

"If all the borders are open, the Jewish nature of the state will be diluted. It's something we have to think about. There's no solution yet."

He cites his own grandchildren as an example of the Israel-Diaspora gap.

"It's hard to get them to listen to what I say — if it's not about computer games — when I say there are young Jews in America.

"They want to go to America, but for Disneyland. They want to go to Paris, for EuroDisney. But it doesn't interest them that there are young Jews around the world," he said.

If the WZO is going to take on the bold task of reversing this apathy, said Narkiss, it cannot continue business as usual.

Uzi Narkiss

Its organizational structure, based on nearly a century of Zionist history, has to change, he believes.

One example: Currently, the WZO operates along divisions based on the type of program being operated, not the region being served.

As a result, representatives promoting aliyah report to a different boss in Jerusalem than do their colleagues, at the next desk in New York, who are promoting student programs.

The frequent result is confusion.

Narkiss wants divisions to serve the different regions in the Diaspora: Europe, North America, South America.

(The WZO's sister organization, the Jewish Agency, has already begun moving toward a geographic orientation. A unit for the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe operates directly under the agency's chief executive, overseeing the work of the different functional divisions.)

Narkiss has added his voice to those calling for a new means of deciding on representation in the WZO.

The WZO calls itself the only democratic institution in Jewish life because its representatives are elected, on party lines, by all members of Zionist organizations.

In the United States and Canada, these organizations include Hadassah, the Canadian Zionist Federation, Zionist Organization of America and Americans for Progressive Israel as well as Zionist groups linked with the Reform, Conservative and Orthodox movements.

Yad Vashem honors Wehrmacht officer

JERUSALEM (JPFS) — The late Wehrmacht Maj. Max Liedtke was recognized as Righteous Among the Nations last week by Yad Vashem, becoming the highest-ranking German officer so honored.

Liedtke is the only officer on record to order his soldiers to use their weapons against SS men if they tried to deport Jews working under his command.

The incident took place on July 26, 1942, in Przemysl, Poland, where Liedtke, then 46, commanded the local garrison. When deportations began, he took more than 80 Jews into his headquarters to protect them. The confrontation with SS troops took place at a bridge over the San River and resulted in the SS pulling back.

Rather than being shot or demoted, Liedtke was sent to the Russian front, where he was captured, later dying in a camp in the Urals in January 1955.

Liedtke's medal was accepted by his son Goetz, 68, a retired customs official who lives in Pocking, Bavaria.

Before being posted to Poland, Liedtke was town commandant of Piraeus, Greece, where he stood out for his humane treatment of the population.

Two of Liedtke's three sons were killed during the war and Goetz, then 17, was wounded. He has written a book about his father.

Sarajevo Jews start yarmulke business

ROME (JTA) — A group of elderly Jewish refugees from Sarajevo, living in temporary housing on the Croatian coast, has started a handmade yarmulke business to earn money and save for whatever future befalls them.

About 20 refugees recently formed the Menorah Club, a Jewish handicrafts workshop.

Club members knit handmade yarmulkes, which they sell for 10 Deutschmarks (about $6) apiece, plus postage. The refugees receive five Deutschmarks per yarmulke, with the rest of the money going for materials as well as for other community expenses.

Most of the kipot are blue with a metallic thread border, but other color combinations are available on request.

"The Menorah Club is working non-stop," said Lenka Montiljo Bilalagic. "Our members are delighted because we are busy, we are useful, we can earn for our future."

The project was started under the encouragement of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee to help what a JDC representative called "enterprising and deserving refugees from Sarajevo" help themselves put something of their lives back together.

The JDC distributed 400 of the yarmulkes at its annual meeting in December, and Jewish organizations in Toulouse, France, this week placed an order for 200.

The Grey Panthers, a club of middle-aged Jewish men in Split, Croatia, also placed an order for 20 yarmulkes.

"If these items catch on," a JDC representative said, "we may extend Menorah to the Svarc (Jewish) Old Age Home in Zagreb, which has so far welcomed about 18 elderly refugees among its 78 residents."

Individuals or organizations wanting to place bulk orders should contact Montiljo Bilalagic, c/o The Jewish Community of Split, Zidovski prolaz 1, 58000 Split, Croatia. Tel/fax: 385/58.45.672.

IN 1967, CANADIAN JEWS GAVE $27 MILLION TO SUPPORT A COUNTRY AT WAR. HOW MUCH WILL WE GIVE TO SUPPORT PEACE?

During war, no one questions the urgent need for money to support Israel. And Canadian Jews have always responded quickly and generously. But today, at this historic juncture in the peace process, the need for money to ensure the enduring security of Israel is just as critical. For 14 years the New Israel Fund has been building a strategic weapon for peace. It's called "Democracy." And we need your help to strengthen it. Because without a strong democracy in Israel and the territories, peace will not work. Without freedom, without equality, without co-existence, peace will not work.

Since 1979, we have raised more than $50 million to support freedom, equality and justice for all people within the borders of Israel—Arab as well as Jew. In 1994, we need to raise $10 million more. Winning a peace, just like winning a war, is expensive. And responding quickly and generously is essential. But if we succeed, you will never have to answer another appeal to support Israel at war again.

Spielberg's critics missed the point

By TOM TUGEND
Special to The CJN

Heroism or Expediency?
Liam Neeson as Oskar Schindler

LOS ANGELES (JTA) — There is a brief quotation from Exodus Rabbah on my bulletin board, in which G-d warns Moses and Aaron that "My children are obstinate, ill-tempered and troublesome."

Steven Spielberg is no Moses. But something like those words must go through his mind when, among the reams of nationwide acclaim for Schindler's List, he comes across a number of harsh reviews — some bordering on the vitriolic — precisely by critics who identify themselves as ardent Jews.

None of the critics lived through the Holocaust or were among the rescued "Schindler Jews," who have confirmed the fidelity of the film to their own experiences and to the basic fact that Oskar Schindler risked his neck and drained his fortune to shield "his" Jews.

Some of the reservations, such as those of Frank Rich of The New York Times, are appropriately within the province of a critic.

Rich, and others, object that none of the Jewish characters in the film are fully developed and "blur into abstraction, becoming another depersonalized statistic of mass death."

What is troublesome are attacks on the movie because it does not bear out the reviewer's own vision of a proper Holocaust film and because the hero is not only a German, but a Nazi party member to boot.

(The tone of such criticism is reminiscent of the reception 45 years ago of Gentleman's Agreement, when some purists denounced the first Hollywood film to deal seriously with American anti-Semitism because the hero was a gentile posing as a Jew.)

Jonathan Kirsch, in his review of Schindler's List in the Los Angeles Jewish Journal, asks why Spielberg chose to make a Holocaust film in which the hero is a Nazi, however good-hearted.

"I wished Spielberg had found his way to, for example, tell the story of the Bielski partisans, rather than Schindler's List," he wrote.

Similarly, Rabbi Eli Hecht, writing in last Sunday's Los Angeles Times, dwells at length on Schindler's well-known womanizing, his ostentation and his use of forced Jewish labor in his factory. Hecht concludes that the German's designation as a righteous person comes close to blasphemy.

The charge will come as a surprise to the Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Martyrs' and Heroes' Remembrance Authority in Jerusalem, not known for pro-Nazi proclivities, which has honored Schindler as Righteous Among the Nations.

Kirsch and Hecht miss two points that more sophisticated analysts of the Holocaust and the deeds of Christian rescuers have amply noted.

Such scholars as Eva Fogelman and Nechama Tec, who have interviewed hundreds of Christians who saved Jews in Poland and France, have concluded that it was impossible to categorize rescuers by their background, politics and motivations.

Unlikely as it may seem, the researchers found numerous instances in which outspoken anti-Semites, many affiliated with Jew-baiting movements, in fact saved hundreds of Jews.

A second point goes to the objection that the horror of the Holocaust is diminished by praising the goodness of a few rather than condemning the cruelty and indifference of the many.

Rabbi Harold Schulweis of Los Angeles, who started the Jewish Foundation for Christian Rescuers, has noted that perhaps only through a knowledge of individual acts of Christian heroism can most Christians face the vastness of Christian guilt during the Holocaust.

Indeed, said Schulweis, "whoever hears or reads the accounts of the rescued must realize that there are no heroes without villains, that the small light in the cave reveals more vividly the dark designs of the predators."

"If anything, to experience immense evil through the eyes of the good enables those fearful of entering the cave to take the first brave steps," he said.

In fairness, both Kirsch's and Hecht's criticisms go well beyond the figure of Schindler, but they come at it from opposite directions.

Kirsch seems to think that the film does not show the true extent of the Holocaust's horror and Jewish suffering. Hecht objects vehemently to any films or museums that show "Jews as victims over and over again."

Both views are defensible, but they simplify the immense complexity of the Holocaust. The Shoah retains its hold on the human and artistic imagination because it contained immense evil and remarkable goodness, incredible carnage and chance survival.

Schindler's List deals with one small part of the tragedy, and does so with dignity and truthfulness.

PLO asks Australia for funds

SYDNEY (JTA) — The Palestine Liberation Organization has asked the government of Australia to finance its office here, claiming an acute shortage of funds.

Ali Kazak, the PLO's Australia representative, said his office might be forced to close because of the cutoff last June of funds that had been supplied by the organization's Tunis headquarters.

A government spokesman said Kazak's request will be examined, but noted that there appeared to be little the government could do to assist the PLO.

He said the government has in the past made financial concessions to diplomatic missions here, but the gestures are generally made on a reciprocal basis.

Along with the request to the Australian government, Kazak has circulated a letter to "friends and supporters" of the PLO, requesting donations of up to $3,500 (U.S.) to help clear debts, pay staff and contribute to the local office's operating costs.

Kazak claimed his appeal came at the direction of "President" Yasser Arafat, the PLO chairman, who had asked him "to call on all our friends and supporters to help alleviate our current difficulties, which we hope will be temporary" and were due to "the savage economic war Israel is conducting against the Palestinian people."

Greg Sheridan, foreign editor of the daily newspaper The Australian, has called on the government to reject out-of-hand Kazak's call for assistance.

"It would be preposterous, and morally offensive, for Canberra (the Australian capital) to give it any financial assistance whatsoever, whether money or cheap premises," Sheridan said.

The News in Brief

Ross Supporter Retires from UNB

FREDERICTON — Matin Yaqzan, the University of New Brunswick mathematics professor whose campus newspaper column on date rape landed him in hot water, has taken early retirement, effective Jan. 1. Reports from New Brunswick indicate Yaqzan will receive a full pension and three years' pay. Yaqzan ignited a firestorm of controversy when he wrote an opinion piece in the university's student newspaper, claiming that if a "promiscuous girl" becomes the victim of an "unwanted sexual experience," she should demand monetary compensation for being "inconvenienced" and not "express moral outrage." Yaqzan was a longtime supporter of Malcolm Ross, the former Moncton teacher who authored several books attacking Jews. Yaqzan also wrote a number letters in which he called Jews revenge-seekers, compared Jewish organizations to the Mafia and said Israeli actions in Lebanon were comparable to Nazi brutalities.

Keegstra Appeals Again

CALGARY — Jim Keegstra, the former Eckville, Alta. teacher twice convicted of promoting hatred against Jews, is appealing his second conviction to the Alberta Court of Appeal. Prosecutors in the case have launched a cross-appeal in which they argue that the $3,000 fine handed Keegstra was inadequate given the severity of the offence, said Hal Joffe, national chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress. The appeal is to be heard on Feb. 2. Keegstra is a former high school social studies teacher who taught that Jews were evil and responsible for wars, revolutions and hardships. After losing his job as a teacher, he was convicted in 1985 of promoting hatred. The Supreme Court of Canada eventually upheld the constitutionality of the anti-hate law, but a new trial was ordered because of errors by the judge. Keegstra was again convicted, but he is now appealing that verdict.

Holocaust Denier Appeals

CALGARY — The Alberta Court of Appeal will also consider the case of Mark Kreutzer, who was convicted two years ago of assaulting a teacher in front of a Calgary school. Kreutzer had been handing out Holocaust-denial material to students, who then complained to a teacher. The teacher confronted Kreutzer and told him to leave the school property. A scuffle ensued and assault charges, followed by a conviction, resulted. Kreutzer's lawyer at trial was Doug Christie, who gained national notoriety for his defence of Keegstra, Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel and other neo-Nazis.

U.S. Support for Plan Still Strong

JERUSALEM — Despite some Israeli perceptions to the contrary, there has been no "real diminution" of U.S. Jewish support for the Middle East peace process, according to a top American Jewish organizational leader. There is only a "growing concern and apprehension about violence and terror," Lester Pollack, chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, said in an address here. He said that the concern about security is partly due to distortions by the news media. He accused the media of not focusing enough on the "positive achievements of the peace process," such as the recent diplomatic accord with the Vatican.

Palestinian Parents Sue Israel

TEL AVIV — The parents of five Palestinian children in the Gaza Strip who were killed in recent years by Israeli soldiers have filed a lawsuit against the Israeli government seeking $360,000 in damages. In an action filed last week in the Tel Aviv District Court, the parents maintained that, under international law, Israel's role in Gaza is that of an "occupying power," and that the government was responsible for the welfare of Gaza's inhabitants, especially for their personal security. The children named in the suit were between 3 and 12 years old when they were killed by shots fired by Israeli soldiers in Gaza's Shati refugee camp. According to documents filed in court, witnesses maintained that the children had not been taking part in hostile activities when they were shot, but had been bystanders or were merely passing by on their way to school. No date has been set for the start of legal proceedings.

More Chernobyl Kids Arrive

KFAR CHABAD — Another flight carrying children from contaminated areas around the Chernobyl nuclear reactor arrived in Israel last week. It was the tenth flight of the Chabad Children of Chernobyl Medical Relief Program, which brings children to Israel for medical treatment. All of the 6- to 12-year-old children on the latest flight are from the Belarussian cities of Gomel and Mozyr, two communities in which alarming increases of thyroid cancer have been reported in children. The Chabad program has to date brought to Israel nearly 1,000 children from contaminated regions in Belarus and Ukraine.

Arson Likely Cause of Shul Fire

MOSCOW — There are new indications, though no hard proof, that arson may have been the cause of the recent fire at the Marina Roscha Synagogue in Moscow. But leaders of the synagogue, which is run by the Chabad movement, apparently have chosen not to press for an investigation. That decision reportedly was made after Moscow city authorities hinted that if an inquiry were requested, officials would withdraw their offer to facilitate the synagogue's rebuilding.

London Cemetery Attacks

LONDON — London police are investigating two anti-Semitic acts of vandalism that have taken place within a month at an East London Jewish cemetery. In the latest incident, vandals broke into the East Ham cemetery last week and spray-painted Nazi slogans on its inside walls and a swastika and anti-Semitic obscenities on three graves of Jews who died in World War II. "Nazis rule" and "Hitler 6 million, Jews 1" were painted in 2-foot-high letters on the walls near the sanctuary. Last month, vandals desecrated five graves at the cemetery. No perpetrators have been found. A police spokesman said he did not think it was the work of an organized neo-Nazi group.

Most ex-Soviets Feel Like Outsiders

JERUSALEM — Most new immigrants from the former Soviet Union feel like outsiders in Israeli society, according to a new survey. The survey, conducted for the Jewish Agency, questioned almost 800 adults, half of whom came to Israel in 1991 and half in 1992. Eighty-two per cent of respondents said they would like to feel that they are part of Israeli society, but only eight per cent report feeling this way. Sixty per cent said they feel like outsiders. Most of those who reported feeling integrated into Israeli society were those who spoke Hebrew or were students. The immigrants said that socially, they mixed almost exclusively with other immigrants from their countries of origin. A full 77 per cent of the 1992 arrivals reported they had never or very seldom mixed with those who have been in Israel for a long time. That number dropped to 61 per cent among those who came the year before.

Israel Files Complaint Against Reuters

TEL AVIV — Israel's chief military censor has filed a complaint with the Reuter news agency and its television subsidiary for broadcasting pictures of an Israel Defence Force anti-terrorist unit beating up Palestinians in the Gaza Strip. Pictures of the Shimshon undercover unit, disguised in Arab garb, were transmitted by Reuters on Sunday, when the unit clashed with Palestinians in the Gaza Strip. The pictures were seen immediately throughout the world. An army spokesman claimed the pictures endangered state security by exposing the identity of several members of the undercover unit and its operating procedures. The censor later informed Reuters that any further breaches of Israel's censorship policies would result in "severe measures."

Herut 'Takeover' at French JNF

PARIS — The French branch of the Jewish National Fund underwent something resembling an unfriendly takeover last month. At the annual assembly of Keren Keyemeth LeIsrael of France, some 200 new members showed up, hoping to elect their own slate of candidates to KKL's National Committee. The new members, who belonged to the rightist Herut movement, outnumbered the rest of the gathering two to one. After much shouting and heckling, Herut members got what they wanted: the right to vote, and they won an overwhelming victory. The victorious slate consisted mainly members of Herut-France and its two youth organizations, Betar and Tagar.

Enlarge Airport: Rabin

TEL AVIV — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has instructed Israel's transport minister to expedite plans for enlarging Ben-Gurion Airport so the facility will be able to handle 10 million passengers a year by century's end. The present facilities can handle only 4 million travelers annually. Expansion plans include constructing a new terminal and runway extension.

By RABBI WAYNE ALLEN

Robert Hughes has exposed the threat of political correctness in his recently published book entitled The Culture of Complaint. Perhaps because he is a transplanted Australian now residing in New York, he has the perspective of an outsider to offer a powerful dose of social criticism that applies equally well to the Canadian experience.

His thesis is simple: political correctness is a dangerous movement towards cultural separatism that is undoing the fabric of society and is bringing free thought to a stop. Some examples he cites are worth considering.

The civil rights, feminist, and gay liberation movements of the last several decades have created a "culture of complaint" wherein groups claiming victim status demand redress, entitlements and apologies from a society that complainers view as oppressive, insidious, white and male.

Afro-centrist extremists have taken to rewriting history, making a series of outlandish claims, including one that credits the building of the pyramids to black Egyptians using telekinesis. All of this to purportedly provide a black perspective on history and science.

In the name of cultural diversity and acceptance of minority rights, these outlandish claims are accepted unchallenged. They are not subject to the same rigorous intellectual tests as other claims because to do so would be viewed as racist. As a result, open debate fails and truth suffers.

Distortion of history

Moreover, Hughes challenges such works like Kirkpatrick Sale's The Conquest of Paradise which portrays Columbus as responsible for the devastation of Native American cultures. Hughes insists that such books merely replace one historical myth, namely Columbus as the noble discoverer, with an equally fallacious one, namely Columbus as the malevolent conqueror. This is not even historical revisionism; it is historical distortion. Hughes admonishes us: "you cannot remake the past in the name of affirmative action."

Blind acceptance of the grievances presented by groups on the left and on the right have transformed a diversified nation — which is good — into a nation of victimized factions — which is not. Our task as Jews is to scrutinize every argument and debate every issue. After all, it is the Torah itself that instructs us to search out the truth; "to investigate and inquire and search thoroughly" (Deuteronomy 13:15; 17:4). If the arguments are sound and the facts are correct, then our support ought to follow. But the uncritical embrace of a cause, no matter how just it may appear to be, will ultimately serve no good.

It is probably with this idea in mind that the author of the Sefer Ha-Hinukh, first published in 1523, explains (Law No. 77) it is contrary to the Torah to follow after the opinions of others no matter their stature or their number merely because they are in the majority.

Sheepishly following after the popular opinions of the day is not the Jewish way. Rather, any opinion that Jews embrace must be rooted in truth and demonstrably correct. Not only judges but every Jew is duty bound to carefully evaluate the facts and come to a conclusion based on solid reasoning and compelling arguments.

It may not be popular to be counted among those who are not politically correct. But popularity has never been a Jewish objective.

Irish Jewish leaders meet PLO chief Arafat

LONDON (JTA) — The chief rabbi of Ireland and the head of the Jewish Representative Council of Ireland met late last month with PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat in Dublin.

Rabbi Simon Harris, who took up his post four months ago, used the occasion to lash out at what he called "the moral bankruptcy" of most Orthodox rabbis for criticizing Israel's accord with the PLO.

A group of British Orthodox rabbis signed a statement blasting the Israel-PLO accord signed in September and a meeting leaders of the Board of Deputies of British Jews held with Arafat in mid-December.

Rabbi Harris said he respected the nearly 60 British rabbis who had acted "out of conscience, but as Zionists" in signing a statement opposing the Board of Deputies' decision to meet with the PLO chief.

The Board of Deputies held a widely publicized meeting with Arafat in London. That meeting, led by Israel Finestein, head of the Board of

'Twitch of peace'

Deputies, was also attended by Israel's ambassador to Britain.

Rabbi Harris, who was accompanied by the Ireland Jewish council leader, Martin Simmons, in meeting with Arafat, said: "In spite of Mr. Arafat's past acts of unspeakable evil, if he shows any twitch of peace, we should meet him. I applaud the Israeli government for the courageous steps it has taken."

He said he met with Arafat "as a Zionist, as a spiritual representative of Jews in the republic, and also mindful of the more than 1,000 Irish Jews who have made aliyah."

Rabbi Harris and Simmons reportedly pressed Arafat for a "blanket public condemnation" of terrorism against Jews in Israel and abroad, an end to the Arab boycott against Israel and a change in the PLO charter, which calls for Israel's destruction.

Arafat has claimed that clause in the charter has been rendered obsolete. But he told Rabbi Harris and Simmons that amending the clause would require a meeting of the Palestine National Council.

Asked why he did not call such a meeting, he reportedly said, "It is very hard to arrange a meeting in Algiers at the present moment," in apparent reference to the strong criticism of the chairman within the PLO.

Israel-PLO crisis shifts attention to Syrian front

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

The recent crisis in the Israel-PLO negotiations unveiled the differences motivating the two parties four months ago, when both entered the road to pacification and earned worldwide applause for their daring.

Their quite incompatible interpretations of the Oslo agreement were underplayed in order to produce the document itself. It was hoped by both sides that the psychological breakthrough would be strong enough to produce progress despite the fact that the text of the celebrated agreement was not a precise prescription for success.

The main theme of the Oslo Delcaration of Principles was graduality. Every single phase of implementation had to be seen working before the next was to be confronted. Each phase had to generate confidence between parties locked in a conflict in which prejudices and illusions counted more than common sense.

What prompted Arafat to precipitate the crisis? One explanation is that he, the former terrorist chief then self-proclaimed president of Palestine and now an airborne world figure, finds it degrading to adjust to a period of probation as the administrator and policeman of Gaza and Jericho, closely watched by Israel's army. He who could by now have started handling the autonomy which was to lead to independence, prefers to sit it out in Tunis and press for symbols of statehood which Oslo had not provided for. He may extract some ambiguous ones but his brinkmanship is dangerous. Even unbiased observers now doubt his reliability. Some of his advisors as well as Egyptians and Jordanians who know what is at stake have tried to bring him down to earth.

Yeshayahu Anug

Meanwhile the stumbling negotiations are seriously eroding the initial faith in the accord. Arab fundamentalist attacks were expected to increase after Oslo, but it was hoped, rather naively, that Arafat loyalists will control the violence. The PLO abstains from terrorism but is not prepared to risk confrontation with Hamas. The Palestinian police force is still not in place. Nor can one expect even the moderate elements within the local PLO to maintain popular trust in the process while Israeli security operations are carried out with the same vigour and results as before the famous handshake in Washington.

In Israel — in addition to political and ideological opposition to the peace process — attention focuses on the settlements whose future is insecure despite official talk. The government tries to calm the apprehensions of the settlers by quoting the provisions of the Oslo agreement which leave the settlements untouched during the five-year interim period and stipulates that Israel security is to guarantee the safety of the settlers. This formula is not reassuring. The issue is in fact the real Achilles heel of the whole agreement.

Despite its enormous efforts, the Israeli government cannot guarantee absolute safety to every Jewish inhabitant of the territories. This is felt in Gaza or in places like Hebron where a handful of fanatic Jewish settlers insist on remaining in the heart of a fundamentalist Arab town. It is also problematic in other areas inhabited by ordinary Jewish settlers who do not seek confrontation. To protect settlers' children on their way to school requires 500 military convoys a day.

The unpopular truth is that peaceful coexistence in the territories, plastered as they are with over 100 settlements big and small, is unthinkable given the nature of extremism on both sides. The future of the settlements must be clearly defined, however poltically uncomfortable the issue may be.

From an Arab perspective too, Israel's intentions are clouded by much ambiguity. If it is true that the Rabin government has curbed the huge flow of financial investment in building settlements, it must also be admitted that the active resistance and circumvention of this new policy by the extremist leadership of the settlements is not decisively challenged by the same government.

The present crisis between Israel and the PLO will be patched up, but others are to follow unless both sides know what to expect from each other.

The crisis has helped shift attention from the tiresome dealings with the PLO to the Syrian and Lebanese sectors, when Syrian president Hafez Assad meets U.S. president Bill Clinton in Geneva on Jan. 16.

The gestation of this first encounter was long and complicated. Syria figures high on the U.S. list of "terrorist countries" and is still subjected to economic restrictions even after its formal participation in the alliance against Iraq during the Gulf War. Deprived of Soviet support, Assad now needs Clinton more than the U.S. needs him. But he also knows he could make an important contribution to the peace process with Israel, which Clinton is very eager to advance.

If Assad comes forward in Geneva with a plausible definition of the quality of peace and security he is prepared to offer in exchange for an Israeli recognition of Syrian sovereignty on the Golan, the now anemic negotiations between the two countries are likely to take off accompanied by vigorous U.S. activism. Here too the principle of graduality is likely to pave the road to a comprehensive solution to embrace both Syria and Lebanon.

If so, the Israeli-PLO sector will lose its present primacy (though not its importance) and give Arafat some time to reflect upon his tactics. Rabin is likely to come out of the crisis politically stronger for his stand on essentials, freer to deal with the implications of a clear Syrian offer. Thus a meaningful meeting in Geneva could well change the mechanism of regional peacemaking and broaden its prospects.

Century-old conflict can't be settled in a few months

By MISHA LOUVISH

Israelis were shocked by the recent murderous attack on Jews in the territories, and it is completely comprehensible that the pain and anger should be felt most keenly by those who have made their homes in the West Bank.

No man should be held accountable for what he does in his grief, the sages said, but that shouldn't be taken as an excuse for the hysterical, irrational and violent reactions of the extremists among the settlers. Indiscriminate retaliation against ordinary Arabs is not only immortal, it is futile. Indeed, it is liable to be counterproductive.

It is in the nature of feuds and vendettas to be self-perpetuating, and there isn't the slightest reason to believe that Hamas or Islamic Jihad fanatics will be discouraged by the burning of Arab cars of the wrecking of Arab classrooms. Such actions are only liable to intensify hatred and encourage recruitment to the terrorist organizations.

It is not surprising that the settlers should also be venting their anger against Yitzhak Rabin's Labor-left government, which has begun to carry out its election promises by negotiating for an interim autonomy regime for the Palestinians, with the ultimate aim of a permanent agreement based on the repartition of the country. The settlers were aided and encouraged by Likud-dominated governments to build more than 100 settlements in the area for the express purpose of making such a solution impossible.

But when they denounce the prime minister as a traitor and deny the legitimacy of his policy, which has been approved by the electorate and the Knesset, they shouldn't whine about "delegitimization" when he gives them the rough edge of his tongue in reply.

Nor have they any right to accuse the government of failing in its duty every time a Jew is murdered by an Arab. Before demanding that the government stop all Arab violence, they should first demand the police stop all crime and the Transport Ministry put an end to the slaughter on the roads.

So long as there is no peace between Jews in their homeland and the Arabs under their rule, there will be some Arabs who fight against that rule by murdering Jews.

The army and the police must take every possible precaution, but they will not eradicate the killings.

It is childish to argue that since we now have an agreement with the Palestine Liberation Organization, we can expect all violence to cease forthwith.

We have a declaration of principles, which is a great breakthrough because it involves recognition of Israel by the PLO, the de facto annulment of the PLO covenant and an undertaking to stop violence. But there isn't yet even agreement on all the details of the autonomy regime.

What Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres have done is start a process which, if all goes well, may lead to peace in the end.

It is bound to take time; a century-old conflict cannot be settled in a few months. What matters is the direction: are we moving toward peace, or away from peace?

The Muslim fundamentalists and the rejectionist groups in the PLO are killing Israeli soldiers and civilians for the express purpose of derailing the peace process and harnessing their people to the old objective, disclaimed by Arafat and the majority behind him, of destroying the "Zionist entity."

Of course, citizens of Israel are entitled to oppose government policy, but they have to face the alternative. If they succeed in stopping the present negotiations, there is no immediate prospect of another peace process, and no one will be better pleased than the enemies of peace. (JPFS)

Dresden's experiment with neo-Nazis unsuccessful

By SHAUL BEN-HAIM

> 'Israel should not be the therapeutic couch for the unsolved problems of Germany.'

The intention may have been honorable, if naive, but the attempt failed miserably.

The idea was to convince a group of eastern German neo-Nazis that the Holocaust did, in fact, take place by introducing them to "living" Jews in Israel.

It was assumed that, like most eastern Germans, the youngsters with the cropped blond hair didn't even know any Jews — although this didn't prevent them from expressing their xenophobia and anti-Semitism by smearing swastikas on overturned gravestones.

The group, which visited Israel last autumn, consisted of self-confessed neo-Nazis and a sprinkling of Russian Jews who have settled in Germany.

"You have such a wonderful country here, why do Jews want to be in Germany?" one of the "skins" asked the guide who toured Israel with them for 10 days. The young Israeli was unsure how to respond. "I didn't say anything, but deep inside me I knew that he had a point," he said afterwards.

The initiator of the project was Dresden city official Marita Schieferdecker-Adolph, a young, vivacious woman in charge of relations between foreigners and natives of Dresden. She viewed the field trip to Israel as a pilot project. If it succeeded, she intended to use the same method to get the Germans to accept and coexist with other foreigners like Vietnamese or Ghanaians. Applying the tactics of New York street-gang social workers, she set out to obtain the confidence of known neo-Nazis.

It was a battle of wits. The relationship between tour leader and neo-Nazis was at best ambiguous. The young and idealistic official was no match for the neo-Nazis, who represented 65 percent of the participants. They used threats and violent body language to force their views upon the group. They imposed an aura of seclusion and secrecy. Nobody was supposed to reveal who they were, and to what organizations they belonged. Nobody was supposed to pry on them during the visit.

In Jerusalem, they behaved as they did in Dresden, treating everybody as a potential foe. Their aggression masked their uncertainty and sense of inferiority.

Schieferdecker-Adolph tried to defend her charges. "I have seen signs that the problems are getting to them, that they are thinking about them," she said. "Recently, one of them commented: 'What is it with a nation that is persecuted for 2,000 years? Isn't it a sign that something is wrong with them ... ?' "

Clearly, the tour leader had no better comprehension of the problems she was trying to tackle than her charges. If she herself didn't understand that the phrasing of that question was unadulterated anti-Semitism, her experiment was doomed to failure.

"Israel should not be the therapeutic couch for the unsolved problems of Germany," observed Yael Yenner, the German-language guide of Yad Vashem, who took the group around. Until her conversion to Judaism and her aliyah three years ago, Yenner was a juvenile-court judge in Hanover.

"The last time I dealt with right-wing extremists was 14 years ago," she said. "I had hoped I should never be forced to deal with their likes again. And now they seem to be following me to Israel."

Yenner didn't mask her distaste for the new generation of neo-Nazis. When they tried to intimidate her, she retorted: "If you want to leave, the door is open. Here, your rules of the game don't count."

Official Israel — the consulate-general in Berlin as well as the Foreign Ministry in Jerusalem — did well to keep its distance from the experiment. Dresden paid for the entire venture and employed travel experts for the organizing. Anything else would have raised the question of why the state of Israel didn't prevent known members of neo-Nazi organizations from entering the country.

The existing law covering the entry of German tourists to Israel deals exclusively with Germans over the age of 65. They need a visa, and they are requested to state what they did during the war. German teenagers don't even need a visa. In view of the growing number of young Nazis in Germany, it might be wise to consider amending the law. (JPFS)

A milestone

Israel's historic agreement with the Vatican to establish diplomatic relations represents a turning point in the often rancorous relationship between the Jewish people and the Roman Catholic church. After centuries of hatred, fear and mistrust, a new era of reconciliation, which may yet blossom into normalization, has finally dawned.

Seventeen months in the making, the accord is actually the result of almost three decades of incremental developments for which Jews and Christians of goodwill have assiduously worked.

The healing process began with the 1965 Second Vatican Council, which repudiated the repugnant idea of collective Jewish guilt for the death of Jesus and called for Christian-Jewish dialogue. This, in turn, paved the way for the first-ever visit by a pope to a synagogue and his condemnation of anti-Semitism; the ground-breaking proclamation by the Vatican that theological obstacles for establishing formal links with Israel had vanished; and, most recently, the meeting between Pope John Paul II and Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi, Yisrael Meir Lau.

Observers agree that the 1991 Madrid peace process — which set into motion bilateral Israeli talks with the Palestinians and subsequently brought about last September's Israel-PLO pact on limited Palestinian self-rule and mutual recognition — spurred the Vatican to begin serious negotiations with Israel.

Israel and the Vatican have always maintained high-level contacts, but until now the Holy See resisted formal diplomatic ties with the Jewish state. In large part, the Vatican's coolness was a function of the unresolved Palestinian question, the heart of the Arab-Israeli conflict. However, once Israel and the PLO signed a declaration of principles (which, unfortunately, has not been implemented as yet), a major political hurdle was cleared, and the Vatican could no longer justify its politically aloof attitude toward Israel.

It goes without saying that the agreement will not erase bitter memories of infamous papal bulls which humiliated and marginalized Jews. Neither will it expunge the anguish of the Vatican's virtual silence and inaction during the Holocaust. And one must wonder why the 15-point document, which was signed in Jerusalem, makes no mention of Israel's capital. Does the omission mean that the Vatican is still committed to the outmoded notion of "internationalizing" Jerusalem? We certainly hope not.

At the end of the day, these misgivings are outweighed by the Vatican's belated decision to officially recognize Israel, as well as its pledge to combat anti-Semitism. In the troubled annals of Jewish-Christian relations, this agreement should be seen for what it is — a milestone.

Irresponsible act

Between 1967, when it broke off diplomatic relations with Israel, and 1991, when a quasi-democracy was restored, the former Soviet Union pursued an implacable anti-Israel policy.

As a result of that policy, billions of dollars worth of armaments were supplied by Moscow to the so-called Arab confrontation states and, in the case of Egypt and Syria, thousands of "civilian" specialists helped direct Arab war objectives against Israel.

Since Mikhail Gorbachev and his successor Boris Yeltsin, the perception has been that the ideological blinders have been removed from Soviet political planning and have been replaced — at least up to now — by a far more mellow, pragmatic and even democratically-oriented stand on foreign policy.

However, bad habits are sometimes hard to shake, even when ideology has disappeared.

This is the only way to explain the disquieting news that last summer, Russian cargo planes were used to transport special truck chassis from North Korea to Syria. These chassis are integral components needed for missile launchers.

American intelligence sources, says the New York Times (Dec. 12), indicate that the truck chassis were taken to Nasariya for use in Syria's Scud missile program. American President Bill Clinton tried, unsuccessfully, to persuade Russian president Yeltsin to stop the shipments. Having failed in this endeavor, the American president hushed up the episode.

It is not the job of an American president to shore up the political fortunes of a foreign leader at the cost of damaging a long- time ally in the Middle East. Syria, moreover, will come into the peace talks when it considers that the involvement will best serve its own interests. Persuasion does not work on dictators like Hafez el Asad.

Russia, moreover, has done little for its image by replacing ideology with opportunism of an odious kind. The Scud missiles which it helped Iraq to perfect wreaked havoc on Israel during the Gulf War, and recent reports indicate that American intercept technology was virtually useless in stopping the Scuds. Placing those same weapons in the hands of Syria is an act of utter irresponsibility.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

CORRECTION

In the Jan. 6 issue, our typographical error in a letter from Michael Wilschanski resulted in a reference to a majority government in Israel when the letter writer said minority.

JEWISH FAMILY LIFE

I am a young Jewish teenager. I attend a Hebrew high school and I am proud of my Jewish heritage, history and roots. Unfortunately, I cannot speak for many other Jewish teenagers, my age, throughout North America.

I strongly believe that without a formal Jewish education, Jews will continue to assimilate in ever increasing numbers. Therefore, it is the responsibility of every Jewish parent to provide their children with a Jewish education. The alarmingly increasing rate of intermarriage threatens the entire Jewish community by cultural assimilation, intermarriage and some say, extinction.

Many young Jews today question their Jewish identity, reasons for honoring Jewish traditions, and remaining in mainstream Jewish society. They feel their lives are complete without a spiritual Jewish existence. Thus, blending into modern society, becoming lost and forgotten Jews. This path will eventually lead to Jewish self destruction.

Jewish education and family life is the only way to ensure children remain Jewish. Parents can not rely solely on teachers and educators to instil Jewish values; children must see and feel Judaism every day. Being effective role models, in a positive Jewish atmosphere, helps parents ensure their children will want to maintain their Jewish identity.

The task of survival is difficult but not impossible. The Jewish community must work together, making survival a priority. Then, perhaps, the new generation of young Jewish people will be able to maintain, and be proud of, their Jewish identity in the time of rapid assimilation.

JUNK MAIL BUSINESS

Debbie Lightstone presents a slanted picture of the junk mail business in her article "Behind a piece of junk mail . . ." (Dec. 2).

She accuses consumers of "trashing" the "painstaking" work of direct marketing firms. Unfortunately, she does not acknowledge the equally demanding efforts required to produce the paper upon which junk mail is printed, nor the effects these often unwanted publicationss have on the environment. She also fails to mention that junk mail often outnumbers required/requested correspondence, and damages legitimized mail.

Many distributors acknowledge consumers have the right to refuse junk mail, and have co-operated with The Recycling Council of Ontario to delete names and addresses from mailing lists. However, Ms. Lighthouse did not choose to commend these admirable and responsible actions. Instead, she placed favorable emphasis on the sophisticated "forward sortation areas" of a company which is not willing to co-operate with these consumers — Canada Post.

Responsible journalism might have included both sides of the picture. Information on the right to refuse junk mail, lobbying distributors to be more responsible to consumers, and the effects of junk mail on the environment, would have provided some balance to Ms. Lightstone's article endorsing the junkmail industry.

'I AM A JEWISH CANADIAN'

Re: The use of the term "Jewish Canadians."

The article titled "Communities rapid growth tied to intermarriage increase" (Dec. 16), except for once, studiously avoids the terms Canadian Jews and Jewish Canadians. It even starts one sentence with "Almost as many Jews as Canadians."

The secular press also avoids the term Jewish Canadians. To me, this leaves the impression that Jews are separate from the rest of Canadians, and that Catholic Canadians and Protestant Canadians and Muslim Canadians and Hindu Canadians etc. are the "real" Canadians but that we Jews are just living in Canada.

I think that this wording is detrimental to our interests. For myself, I am very pleased to be a Jewish Canadian, someone who is proud both of his religion and of his country, and who believes that there is no conflict between the two positions.

JEWS IN CANADA

Re Dec. 16 article titled "Communities rapid growth tied to intermarriage increase."

In the article statistics are shown several times comparing data about Jews and Canadians, eg., "Almost as many Jews as Canadians . . ." and "Jews are three times more likely than Canadians. . . ." I consider these wordings as incorrect and harmful.

The wording in your article implies that the Jews living in Canada are not Canadians. Since most Jews feel strongly about our differences in religion and/or ethnicity, a better wording would be Jewish Canadians versus other Canadians, or Jews versus other Canadians. This would not diminish our Jewishness, but would indicate that we are an integral part of Canadian society.

HELP THE HOMELESS

I chanced upon the letter regarding the homeless shelter after my family and I had returned from working at one of the seven churches mentioned in the letter (CJN Dec. 2).

The sentiments were exactly what we had voiced. It is a disgrace. Why is there nothing like this being done in the Jewish community?

If the churches can open their doors and come to the aid of the needy with a united, open, human and compassionate response, why can't our synagogues?

The 80 men and women from various backgrounds, including Jews, were not only fed, given shower facilities, a bed and some breakfast, they were shown some human kindness and caring.

I believe by being inactive and overlooking this tragic but realistic problem, we are depriving not only adults, but more importantly our children, of a unique opportunity to do something concrete and essential for the truly needy people of Toronto. Our kids could most likely handle it better than some parents.

I have done much volunatry work over the year. All have been rich and rewarding experiences, but my evening spent serving the homeless was the most gratifying and humbling experience of them all.

The numbers of street people and homeless wil keep rising with the realities of our economy. Will we stand and be counted? We must stop being insular and stretch our tzedakah to all human beings in need.

Israelis worried about uncertainties of the future

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

I wrote this column on the day when the pull-out of Israel from Gaza and Jericho was to have started. For someone returning from Israel the delay could not come as a surprise.

I visited Israel late last year and everywhere I went I initiated a discussion on peace prospects. Only occasionally did Israelis wish to know whether I had any opinions on the matter and what they were.

The people to whom I had occasion to speak ranged over a good deal of the social landscape. None of them was an active politician, but some had been in politics or government careers in the past — former ambassadors or employees of the Department of Foreign Affairs, or professional analysts.

Then there were the "average" people, whose orientation ranged from the left to the right. And finally, I had three in-depth conversations: with drivers who took us from Haifa to Jerusalem, from Jerusalem to Beersheva, and from there to Ben-Gurion Airport. We had hour-long talks, and I found the three men who sat at the wheel to be forthcoming, good thinkers — and worried.

There was a consensus among all those with whom I spoke on two things: One, the pre-agreement status quo was not working and had become intolerable. Two, the peace process that had started was irreversible. Once begun it could not be turned back.

Rabbi Plaut

But how far will the process go? Here the division of opinions became clear — and the usual political alignments did not seem to apply.

Thus, a former Israeli ambassador who had always been on the Labor side of the spectrum and who was firmly in favor of the process itself, said flatly: "This one will not work." Another, always on the Likud side, was more cautious: "I don't like it," he said, "but we'll have to live with it one way or another."

There was one overriding sentiment: everyone was worried. The future was uncharted and there was no way of telling which way the ball would roll: would there be an orderly arrangement or would there be chaos? After that came the familiar Israeli shrug — a mixture of hope fuelled by a sense of eternal confidence: yihyeh tov, it'll be alright in the end.

But the anxiety which exists is not readily seen in the every day which the tourists observe. They will see the sights and people en masse without having a chance to look below the surface. And the surface is bright and glistening: the economy is booming, unemployment has receded drastically, and the new immigrants are beginning to find their place.

The Russians who yesterday were close to despair because their enormous influx — all coming at one time — was impossible to absorb properly, have now entered a more orderly process. To be sure, many of these olim do not work at the craft or profession which had been theirs in the former Soviet Union, but they are working — in part a repetition of the German-Jewish immigration of the mid '30s when many professionals became farmers or factory workers. Only now the figures are so much larger and the pressure so much greater. A number of Russian newspapers can be seen on the stands, and Russian is heard everywhere. It seemed that all the personnel who looked after our hotel rooms had come from a Russian background.

Arabs keep a low profile. The only place where I found them was at Haifa University with its large number of Arab students. But if someone had not pointed them out to me I would never have known. They were just part of the crowd.

That, of course, is the hope that lies at the end of the road. Somehow the violence will have to die down, and the process of living next to each other will have to begin. I remember my own youth. I grew up in Germany after World War I, when we were indoctrinated with one major "belief": that the French were our eternal enemies and could never be trusted. But in my own lifetime I have seen a reversal of this doctrine which had seemed so fundamental in my youth. Today Germans and French have an open border between them, and both are advocates of a strong European union.

To be sure, that took some 50 years or more to reach that point. Will it last that long in Israel where the landscape is so much narrower and the opportunities for becoming acquainted are so much greater? That is the hope of many who believe that this will indeed take place sooner or later — and hopefully sooner.

As for the question that was asked of me occasionally: "What do you in the Diaspora think about all this?" I hedged my answer and said: "Of course, we all hope that peace will come to Israel. But we who do not live here cannot tell you what chances you should take. What we can tell you is that we are part of you. We always have been and we always will be."

Jewish lawyer to assume diplomatic post in Morocco

By HILLEL KUTTLER

Former Israeli resident Marc Ginsberg is moving back to the region he once called home.

But the American-born, Israeli-raised Washington lawyer won't be joining his family in Jerusalem or Kibbutz Misgav Am.

Ginsberg, an international trade attorney, is heading for Morocco. He will become the next American ambassador there.

"This was the fulfillment of a lifelong dream," he said. "I always wanted to be a foreign service officer. Then here comes something like this at the ripe old age of 42, particularly going to a Middle Eastern country, an Arab country, with my upbringing."

The State Department does not classify U.S. envoys by religion and could not say whether Ginsberg is the first Jewish ambassador to an Arab country.

Middle East analysts here believe his appointment probably would have been inconceivable but for strides in the peace process.

Ginsberg's unconventional path, from Brooklyn to Haifa to Washington to Rabat, began in 1959, when his father died.

Needing a summer-long respite from the tragedy, Harriet Ginsberg signed up her four boys in an Orthodox summer camp in New York and went to Israel for the first time, having neither friends nor family there.

She liked the place so much, she scooped the kids up at summer's end and brought them to Israel.

Although Ginsberg intended to study architecture at the Technion, he decided instead to return to the United States and enrolled at American University in Washington, D.C. He later completed a law degree at Georgetown University in the American capital.

Foreign-affairs positions in the Senate and State Department - he was involved in the SALT II treaty and the Camp David Accord - led to Ginsberg's appointment by then-president Jimmy Carter as liaison to the Jewish community during what he called a "a very rough time" in Carter's relations with Jews.

It was after Carter lost the White House later that year that Ginsberg stumbled onto Bill Clinton, then rebounding from his own ouster after one term as Arkansas' governor. The two shared an office at the Democratic National Committee (DNC) in Washington and evaluated their futures.

"We talked a lot," Ginsberg said. "I admired him a lot for going back to Arkansas, because he'd just been rejected by the voters of his state."

Ginsberg joined a Washington law firm and immersed himself in local politics, eventually inaugurating Clinton's campaign organization in Maryland in 1991.

When Clinton won the Democratic nomination, Ginsberg became deputy press secretary for foreign affairs. But he turned down White House jobs after the election and returned to his firm.

Ginsberg, who is married with two children, is intent on applying his international trade experience to expand Morocco's export potential, as Morocco weans itself off the $40 million U.S. assistance that has dropped to zero.

"The U.S. has the opportunity to transition the relationship with Morocco from the Cold War to the post-Cold War, and that's going to be my marching orders, to make that happen," he said.

The new posting won't prevent Ginsberg from travelling to Israel frequently to visit his family. His mother Harriet, now 76, and his younger brother, Michael, live on Kibbutz Misgav Am. Ginsberg's twin, Larry, lives in Jerusalem.

At a family reunion in Kiryat Shmona two years ago, the Ginsberg brothers pondered their past. "None of us would have ever traded it for anything else," Ginsberg said. "Those were some of the most relatively peaceful times in Israeli history."

But Ginsberg has no confusion as to his identity and loyalties.

"I care passionately about the United States. This is my country," he responded sternly to a question on the likely reception in Rabat of an Israeli-raised American envoy.

"I became more of an American living in Israel than an Israeli. This person is one of the luckiest persons alive to be a citizen of this country. And Israel is the adopted country of my family. I pride myself over the years in being able to talk to Arabs, to reach out to them, without the baggage of my resume." (JPFS)

It's a dog's life in the Israeli court system

By CARL ALPERT

Israel's courts are famous not only for their administration of justice, but for the way they reflect the human drama of life in Israel. For example:

A Dog's Day In Court. Yehudit Guslaker appeared in court to answer a charge made against her by her poodle to the effect that she mistreated it, beat it and made its life miserable. The accusation was written in Hebrew, but was signed with the dog's paw prints. Guslaker charged that the dog had been put up to it by her husband, with whom she was engaged in marital litigation.

Was the Snake an Accomplice? Three Arab housebreakers from Gaza devised a novel warning system to alert them to returning home owners while the men were "at work." They deposited a snake at the entrance to the house, knowing that if the owners did return they would shout in excitement upon seeing the snake, and thus warn the thieves. However, the latter failed to take into consideration a burglar alarm which led to their being caught.

A Grave Concern. After four years in litigation, the Supreme Court ruled that parents of a deceased man had the right to have their names entered on their son's tombstone, indicating parentage, but didn't have the right to remove the stone which the widow had put up, nor to erase the new family name which their son had chosen.

> 'I only took a bus to the airport.'

Men Have Rights Too. The plaintiff, an unmarried religious man, charged that some time ago he met a woman who told him she was unwed, and the two developed a romantic attachment. After some time, however, he discovered that she was married. He demanded damages of 5,000 shekels because she had caused him to commit adultery, a heinous sin. He had endured grievous mental suffering. The judge's ruling: The complaint sounded more like an attempt at revenge, after she had broken off their relationship, but he awarded damages of 550 shekels.

The Public Right to Know. The Rondoplast Company, manufacturers of insulation materials, petitioned the court to stop publication of a consumer guide which criticized its products. According to the company, the report gave the impression that findings were based on laboratory tests instead of the questionnaires used. Tel Aviv District Court Judge Drora Pilpel ruled in favor of the consumer organization.

"I Only Took a Bus to the Airport." A 31-year-old resident of Kiryat Yam told the Magistrate's Court in Haifa that he had promised his parents he would pick them up at the airport. His own car was in the garage, so he took a bus to the airport. The charge: He took it without the consent of the bus company.

Can You Beat This One? A 3-year-old boy, acting through his lawyer, filed suit in Jerusalem District Court against his mother and her insurance company for injuries which he sustained when she was involved in an automobile accident. At the time, he was a fetus and the defects revealed when he was born seven months later were attributed to that accident. The boy lives happily with his parents, but had to bring suit against his mother in the companion suit against the insurance company.

Christian Intolerance, She Charges. A Muslim girl in the village of Um el-Fahm, who enrolled at a Christian school in Nazareth, was told she could not wear the Islamic headcovering at school. The Israel Civil Liberties Union took up her case on the grounds that the school violated her freedom of religion.

And the Soldiers Rejoiced. Belly dancer Barry Simon was found guilty of income tax violations in Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court. Judge Chaya Chefetz sentenced her to three months of public service in lieu of prison. Barry is to carry out the service by performing before soldiers and at hospitals and homes for the aged.

They Look Alike, Too. Two sisters who took the matriculation exams had their exams nullified for copying when it was found their replies were identical. Their defence: they had studied with the same teacher, read the same books and had gone over the material together. They went to court, and the final ruling was in their favor on the grounds of reasonable doubt.

Emigration trend in Bryansk

Sheldon Kirshner investigates the Jewish cultural revival in Bryansk, a provincial Russian city.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Closed to foreigners until glasnost and perestroika, Bryansk is a cloistered place, far from the bustle of Moscow or St. Petersburg.

Even today, following the collapse of the Soviet Union and the demise of communism, it seems insulated from the winds of change sweeping over Russia.

Approximately 340 kilometres southwest of Moscow, near the newly-independent states of Belarus and Ukraine, Bryansk is a model Soviet city — gray, stolid and utterly boring, with no apparent redeeming features.

It has a big-city population of 500,000, but the appearance of a backwoods burg. The streets are wide, windy and sterile. The finer buildings are neo-Stalinesque piles which are meant to intimidate rather than impress. The interminable apartment blocks are drab and depressing. The best hotel in town — hard by an exquisite, onion-domed Russian Orthodox church which somehow eluded destruction during the Communist era — is bleak and hardly any better than a Salvation Army hostel.

In Bryansk, the consumer revolution which has just begun to trickle down to the masses in cities like Moscow and St. Petersburg is barely in evidence. There are no flashy foreign cars, no BMWs or Mercedes gliding by boxy Ladas. Colorful outdoor billboards flogging Western cigarettes, liquor, soft drinks and jeans are practically non-existent. Kiosk capitalism, with its siren call to private enterprise, has yet to emerge. Longer queues form at shops and bakeries. Fashion remains the domain of imported glossy magazines.

For decades, because it was a hub of sensitive defence industries, Bryansk was off-limits to foreign passport holders. But what tourist would want to visit Bryansk today?

Before the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution, Bryansk was outside the Pale of Settlement and, therefore, relatively few Jews were permitted to darken its precincts. The community, however, grew modestly. By the turn of the 19th century, Bryansk was home to slightly more than 1,000 Jews.

On the eve of World War II, several thousand Jews lived here. Bryansk was captured by the German army in October 1941, four months after the wehrmacht had invaded the Soviet Union. Jews who had not managed to flee were rounded up and murdered in freshly-dug pits. It's estimated that upwards of 16,000 Jews, from Bryansk and surrounding towns and villages, were killed in the course of the Holocaust. By 1945, Bryansk itself had all but been levelled.

After the war, the Jewish community experienced a spurt of growth. But today, sapped by constant emigration, Bryansk's Jewish population is down to 4,000, according to Dmitri (Dima) Plotkin, president of the Jewish Centre of Information and Enlightenment and a regional leader of the Confederation of Jewish Organizations and Communities (Vaad).

By the criteria of Israel's Law of Return, though, as many as 10,000 Jews may be living in Bryansk. Around Bryansk, in towns like Klinzy, Novozivkob and Uneche, there are believed to be some 500 Jewish families.

Probably due to its former status as a closed city, the Jewish cultural and religious revival in Bryansk has been of a modest, unassuming nature. The same is doubtless true of similar cities in Russia.

As Plotkin tells it, the first Jewish activists here were a handful of Hebrew teachers, the majority of whom have since made aliyah. Plotkin, 29, is widely credited with being the main force behind Bryansk's Jewish rebirth, such as it is. By his count, about one-third of Bryansk's Jews take part in the Jewish renaissance.

Plotkin was one of the founders, in 1992, of the Jewish Centre of Information and Enlightenment, which is located at 4 Ploshod Partisan. The organization, as much a funnel of aliyah as a fount of Jewish knowledge, occupies a small three-room flat on the third floor of a non-descript building with no lighting in the stairwells. Inside are a few desks, a scattering of typewriters, Israeli flags and tourist posters, stacked cardboard boxes and a working kitchen.

The Jewish Centre of Information and Enlightenment is the only Jewish organization in Bryansk, and that suits Plotkin. "This way, there is no conflict," he explained, totally oblivious to the Western concept of pluralism.

An engineer by training, Plotkin comes from a fairly assimilated family which, he says, was "neither traditional nor religious." His mother, as well as his grandmother, were members of the Communist party.

Being a product of the Soviet system, Plotkin was not, as is customary under Jewish law, circumcised eight days after his birth. Nor did he have a Bar-Mitzvah. But curious about his faith, he ventured into Bryansk's sole functioning synagogue — a forlorn wooden shack with a simple bimah, chairs and two tables — when he was 18.

Around the same time, Plotkin went to Moscow to learn more about himself. He acquired an acquaintanceship with Judaism and a smattering of Yiddish and Hebrew. At 19, he submitted to circumcision. "I'm the only one in my family who's been circumcised," he said.

The community has two Sunday schools, with about 50 pupils each. They were opened in 1990, in rented classrooms in regular Russian schools. There is no day school as yet.

The community is in dire need of a kindergarten. "We have a waiting list of 50 to 80 kids," he said. But the project is dependent on the generosity of the National Conference of Soviet Jewry in the United States.

Meanwhile, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the Jewish Agency of Israel plan to build a bigger community centre, with an ulpan, library and youth club.

Needless to say, Bryansk has no rabbi. But until 1985, the year of his death at 95, services were led by a man steeped in Judaic rites. The synagogue, which has been in the hands of the community since 1945, looks more like an abandoned shed than a shul. Nevertheless, vandals set fire to its door two years ago. Plotkin strongly believes the assailants were anti-Semites.

The Choral Synagogue, built in 1894, was expropriated by the regime in 1927. It was then used as a cinema and a social club. Today, it houses municipal offices.

Plotkin has tried to regain the property, but to no avail. Other Jewish properties, he said, were destroyed during the Nazi occupation.

There is no Jewish cemetery, the only one having been shut in 1945 and its grounds turned over to a school which stands in its place. Nowadays, Jewish burials take place in a section reserved for Jews. Hooligans regularly overturn headstones.

There was a Jewish newspaper, but it foundered after 10 editions. "Ain kesef," said Plotkin.

In Plotkin's view, emigration is the trend of the future, yet he hastens to add that virtually all would-be emigrants have their sights set on countries other than Israel.

"There are more opportunities elsewhere," he said. "Letters we get from former residents of Bryansk in Israel tell a bad story of poor absorption." He personally knows of 10 families who've actuallly returned to Russia from Israel.

Still, most Jews are going to Israel, if only because they cannot meet the increasingly stringent requirements of nations like Canada and the United States.

Emigration, he explained, is a function of anti-Semitism, the threat of political instability and, concomitantly, the desire by parents to ensure a better future for their children.

In Bryansk, anti-Semitism is "a serious problem, like in Moscow or Canada." He cites the vandalism at the cemetery and the random anti-Semitic jibes which occasionally greet Jews on streets and in buses.

Referring to the October putsch in Moscow, which might have touched off a civil war had it not been summarily crushed by troops loyal to Russian President Boris Yeltsin, Plotkin observed: "After these terrible events, many more Jews are looking at emigration."

The fear of an environmental disaster is yet another factor spurring emigration. As Plotkin succinctly put it, "Chernobyl is only 200 kilometres away."

Emigration from Bryansk and environs began in the early 1970s, when a few families were permitted to leave. Since 1989, about 3,000 Jews have left. Most have ended up in Israel. Almost all the rest have gone to Germany and the United States. A few have reached Canada via Israel.

To date, a large proportion of the emigrants have been the elderly (who are eligible for social welfare benefits) and the young (who are more likely to find jobs.)

"People aged 45 and up have generally stayed," said Plotkin. "But as a result of the fighting in Moscow, they, too, have begun to show an interest in leaving."

Current emigration levels from the Bryansk area are running at about 10 to 12 families per month.

Plotkin, who's married with three children (1, 3 and 5), intends to emigrate to Israel "as quickly as possible." But in the next breath, he conceded that he has been mulling over the option for the past several years. Certainly, his wife wants to make aliyah. She has relatives in Israel.

Plotkin's assistant, Lina Kokotova, 23, is seriously considering aliyah, although her parents and her brother intend to remain behind. "I think I will feel more at home in Israel," said Kokotova, who considers herself a Zionist.

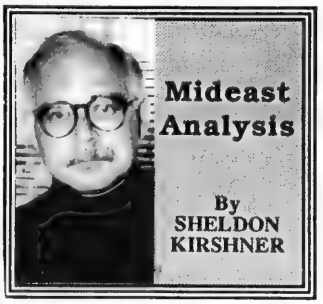
Inna Keepan, a 30-year-old music teacher at the Jewish Sunday school, is planning to move to the United States. "I see no future in Russia," she stated bluntly.

Her colleague, Arkady Orloff, a 30-year-old photographer and Sunday school Jewish history teacher, hopes he can make a new life for himself and his family in Canada.

"I think Canada will be better than Russia." He is aware of Canada's high unemployment rate, but it does not deter him. If necessary, he'll be glad to go to Israel.

For now, Ella Boroditskaya, a 43-year-old music teacher, is staying in Russia. But she will not be surprised if she ultimately emigrates.

"I have visited Israel, and life for new olim is hard and demanding. Russian Jews feel like second-class citizens in Israel. But, for a Jew, it's easier to live in a country like Israel, where no one will call you a zhid."



When Bill Clinton meets Hafez Assad in Geneva on Jan. 16 for the first meeting between an American and a Syrian president since 1990, they will focus on the peace process, but also try to resolve the manifold differences which mar the United States' bilateral relationship with Syria.

Last month, Syria agreed to resume talks with Israel, broken off by Assad in September after the disclosure that the PLO had reached an historic rapprochment with Israel without either his knowledge or approval. Assad believes that the Arabs should work in unison and not sign potentially divisive separate agreements with Israel.

But now that Syria has re-entered the negotiations, which have been dragging on since 1991 without a single practical achievement, the two sides are, in effect, back to square one.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin wants Syria to define with precision the elements of a peace treaty before he spells out the exact dimensions of an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights. Since Assad is loath to make the first move, an impasse has developed. And it's exacerbated by Rabin's belief that Israel's accord with the PLO must be consolidated before further progress can be forged on the Syrian track.

The Clinton administration supports Israel's demand for a detailed Syrian exposition on the nature of peace. However, the United States holds that the momentum of Israel's agreement with the PLO should not be squandered by delays. Washington maintains that, without Syria, the Israel-PLO accord cannot be translated into a comprehensive settlement of the long-simmering, often explosive Arab-Israeli conflict.

In his discussions with Assad, Clinton will also make the point that Syria should participate in the multilateral talks on regional co-operation, which began with the Madrid peace process. Syria has boycotted them because of Israel's refusal to commit itself to a total withdrawal from the Golan. Syria's foreign minister has offered Israel "full peace for full withdrawal."

Clinton and Assad

Assad will try to convince Clinton that he should remove Syria from a list of countries implicated in state terrorism. Syria, which has been on the list since 1979, has close ties with such rejectionist groups as Ahmed Jibril's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine — General Command and George Habash's Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

Syria, too, has been linked with the attempted bombing of an El Al passenger plane (1986) and with the downing of Pan Am Flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland (1988).

The Syrians deny links with terrorism. The United States believes that Syria has not been directly involved in international terrorism since 1986, but faults Syria for its support of groups which engage in it.

Although Syria has begun to carry out its promise to issue more exit visas for Syria's Jews, the United States will continue to monitor Syrian compliance. In the aftermath of the demise of the Soviet Union, Syria's chief ally, Assad is interested in improving relations with Washington. Therefore, there is little reason to believe that he will renege on this pledge.

Undoubtedly, Clinton will press Assad to abide by the 1989 Taif agreement, which obliges Syria to pull its estimated 40,000 troops out of Lebanon, a Syrian protectorate. Whether Clinton raises the delicate question of Syrian involvement in the Lebanese drug trade is an open question. High-ranking Syrian officers are widely considered to be key players in the growing, refining and trafficking of narcotics.

Syria's dismal human rights record — which the U.S. State Department and Amnesty International have condemned — may well be on the agenda. Torture and arbitrary arrest are common. Freedom of speech and assembly is unknown.

Assad will probably grumble about Washington's pro-Israel policy. After Iraq's invasion and annexation of Kuwait in 1990, Damascus and Washington temporarily set aside their quarrels so that Syria could join the anti-Iraqi coalition. But since then, Assad has been quite critical of American economic, political and military assistance to Israel, and resentful of Washington's critique of Syria's purchase of ballistic missiles from North Korea and China.

University school year changed for holidays

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In response to requests from the rabbinate and Jewish staff members, the University of Manitoba's senate has agreed to delay the beginning of the 1994-95 school year to accommodate staff and students observing Rosh Hashanah.

"I am very pleased," says Rabbi Jeffrey Gale, spiritual leader of the Reform Temple Shalom who spearheaded the drive to bring about the change.

According to Rabbi Gale, he received a phone call early last fall from a University of Manitoba professor concerned over plans to begin classes on Rosh Hashanah. The current chair of the Council of Rabbis, Rabbi Gale promised to look into the matter. He wrote a letter to Dr. Arnold Naimark, the (Jewish) president of the university, asking him to consider changing the first day of classes.

"Dr. Naimark's initial response was sympathetic but he couldn't give any guarantees other than that students and staff would be accommodated," Rabbi Gale says. "I took his response to the Council of Rabbis and I went to The Jewish Post and News. I tried not to be inflammatory. I worked on the assumption that everyone involved meant well.

Exchange of letters

"I wasn't trying to accuse anyone of anti-Semitism. Rather I wanted to raise the community's awareness of the issue. I would think that Jewish university students and staff would want to be in synagogue for the High Holidays."

After the first exchange of letters, Rabbi Gale received phone calls from two other concerned professors. He reports that the Council of Rabbis' response to Naimark was that although he meant well, his assurances were not good enough.

According to Naimark, he pointed out to the rabbis that only the university senate could change the academic calendar. The issue was brought before the senate in December, he reports, where Rabbi Moshe Stern, a longtime professor at the university, spoke on the issue and was able to sway the senate.

"I am pleased that Rabbi Stern's persuasive approach had a positive effect on the senate and there was agreement to accommodate this concern," Naimark says. "The officials in the Student Records Office are currently trying to alter the original calendar in ways that will create the least disturbance."

Rabbi Gale offers his personal thank-you to Naimark for his efforts in this matter. He further reports the University of Winnipeg followed suit shortly after.

Quebec judge named to province's top court

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

Henry Steinberg, recently appointed to Quebec Court of Appeal, has lifted some of the mystery surrounding the judicial system.

MONTREAL — Henry Steinberg, a new appointee to the Quebec Court of Appeal, describes the job of judging as akin to being a drama critic.

As a judge, he is "an observer of the tragedy and comedy that unfold in the courtroom. I am the audience in the theatre where emotions are displayed, passions are vented and eloquence is cultivated."

And like those reviewers who can make or break a performer, the affable Steinberg calls himself a "narrator of stories and author of judgments."

Steinberg, one of only a handful of Jews to reach the province's highest court, is also one of the few judges in Quebec whose name is recognized by a significant segment of the public.

That's because while sitting on the Quebec Superior Court Steinberg did an unusual thing: he wrote a book, Backstage at the Palace/ An Irreverent Romp Through the Hall of Justice, a light-hearted look at life on the bench. It was published simultaneously in French under the title Les Dessous du Palais.

Both versions remained on the local bestseller lists for several weeks last year.

Steinberg, a graduate of McGill University, was called to the Quebec Bar in 1962. He practised commercial and real estate law for 23 years before his appointment to Superior Court in 1985, where he presided in both the civil and criminal divisions. His appointment last year to the Court of Appeal was a federal one, made by then Conservative justice minister Pierre Blais.

According to criminal lawyer Raphael Schachter, the choice is an inspired one. "Henry is a remarkable example of somebody who has come up the ranks...He has a quick mind and a wonderful feeling for the human condition. You could say he's a perfect mensch — with a brain."

Barbara Kay, a longtime friend of Steinberg and his wife Janice, describes him as a "natural" for the bench. "He's got great common sense and compassion, along with erudition."

Steinberg said his goal in publishing a humorous memoir — mid-career — was to demystify the judicial system and show that judges are mortals trying, for the most part, to do the best they can. He welcomes public scrutiny, believing citizens will be better served by their courts if they know more about them.

Once the refuge of the criminal and/or wealthy, the courts today hear more cases and are asked to solve ever more diverse problems as Quebec, like the rest of North America, becomes an increasingly litigious society.

"Today, all kinds of people are passing through the courts, They will function much better if they know something about how the judiciary operates," Steinberg said in an interview.

Having one's day in court is often, in reality, at odds with the popular conception.

Without wishing to detract from the respect due to the court, Steinberg thinks that the administration of justice can only be enhanced by making it a little more open, more human — and that goes for judges, too.

While knowledge of the law and experience help, Steinberg acknowledges that ultimately a judge relies on the same sense anyone uses to decide who is telling the truth. "We are just a little more skilled at putting aside our preconceived notions."

He is, however, acutely aware of the profound affect a judge's decision can have on the lives it touches. It can be a lonely, emotionally draining profession, he admits.

"Essentially, the judiciary is people helping people solve disputes in a civilized manner," he says. His hope was that the book would "lift some of the secrecy and admit fresh air" to the process.

Despite the imperfections inherent in a legal system that is run by fallible human beings, Steinberg keeps going because of his conviction that the law "stands between civilized society and anarchy, protecting people from unwarranted intrusion in the pursuit of their personal goals."

Backstage at the Palace (a play on the Montreal courthouse's name Palais de Justice) grew out of a little black book Steinberg kept from the time he became a judge, collecting amusing anecdotes and stories. As his book proves, material was not hard to come by.

Chana Weisberg (left), dean of The Women's Institute of Advanced Torah Studies, and Goldie Plotkin, executive director, plan upcoming programs.

'Brainstorming' leads to women's courses

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto's already rich educational scene is getting even better with the founding of an advanced study program for women. Just ask Goldie Plotkin and Chana Weisberg, executive director and dean respectively, of the Women's Institute of Advanced Torah Studies, which is starting its first session Jan. 31.

Weisberg and Plotkin have been involved in running courses, lectures and classes for women for some time.

However, Weisberg told the CJN, women she spoke to "felt that there were not enough serious, intellectual courses for women. They wanted something especially for them, not part of someone else's program — something to meet their intellectual, spiritual and emotional needs."

Although they recognize that there are many courses available in Toronto, Plotkin notes, "women can get a feminist perspective across better — men haven't gone through the same experiences women have."

They also felt that, in the modern era, when women receive advanced secular education, religious education must keep pace. As well, they note, women are called upon to assist their children, who are getting more intensive training than was usual in the past.

"Education is the key to Jewish continuity," Weisberg said.

A mere eight months ago, Weisberg and Plotkin began "brainstorming," as Plotkin says. "At the time it was just a dream. But we felt the time was right."

The pair called a parlor meeting-cum-lecture to see if there was a genuine interest, and if they could get support. The result thrilled them — women from the whole spectrum of the community — Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, and unaffiliated, came out, enjoyed the lecture, and offered financial, advisory, and participatory assistance.

They also, which is more to the point, promised to attend.

The courses will be set up in one hour segments, two per night. The six-week session starting January 31 will begin with "Exploring Classic Jewish texts on Feminine Spirituality," given by Weisberg, using classic texts from the Kabbalah, the Aggadah and elsewhere to explore the lives of great Jewish women in Biblical times.

The second hour will be an introduction to Talmud, given by Dr. Leo Steiner. The last weeks of this particular session will involve a study of part of the tractate Bava Metzia.

Possible topics for future sessions include studies of the Bible or Prophets; hidden codes in Torah and Prophets; Jewish history; practical Halachah; medical ethics; Jewish prayer and meditation; philosophy; Kaballah and the Jewish life cycle.

All courses will be taught by experts in their fields, and some subjects, the pair expect, will go over several sessions.

The institute is designed for women at all levels of education, knowledge and observance. In fact, no previous background or knowledge of Hebrew at all is necessary for either course. Eventually, Weisberg said, some courses will be offered at different levels.

Classes are held at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, 3600 Bathurst St. Cost is $30 per course, or $50 for both courses.

For more information, or to register, telephone (905) 889-6066.

Piecing together the history of the organization is difficult because its archives were lost when the Friends moved its national office from Montreal to Toronto in the late 1970s.

The event is not only for those with long memories; Koffler is hoping people of all ages attend, including young people who have attended Hebrew University's program for foreign students or been otherwise connected with its activities.

Over the past decade, some 1,100 Canadians enrolled in the Rothberg Overseas Program.

Certainly, the Canadian Friends has been one of the most successful fundraisers for the university, claiming the title of raising more per capita than any other such society in the world.

Koffler and Bloomfield speak of the remarkable familial feeling that has developed between members of the Friends, a loyalty that has been passed down through the generations.

It has endowed 35 chairs, including those in honor of such well-known people as Bora Laskin, chief justice of the Supreme Court; conductor Zubin Mehta; archeologist Yigal Yadin; and business executives Paul Desmarais and Conrad Black.

Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick, Jerusalem Mayor Teddy Kollek, Israeli Labor party leader Shimon Peres, and New York governor Mario Cuomo are among those who have addressed its dinners in recent years.

The Friends has offices in Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver, and active chapters in many other communities.

Pollard's life, plight focus of planned film

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel Ellis has joined thousands of others who believe the plight of Jonathan Pollard is the stuff of which movies are made.

Except that Ellis has taken the belief literally.

A 28-year-old self-described businessman and failed candidate in York Centre for the NDP in last fall's federal election, Ellis has embarked on an ambitious project: committing to the silver screen the life and times of Pollard, the former U.S. Navy civilian analyst now serving a life prison term for passing classified information to Israel.

Ellis is concerned that any movie about Pollard will be "Hollywoodized" into a slick, shallow vehicle that will fictionalize, sensationalize or distort the truth.

In other words, Ellis envisions a docudrama, one that will tell the whole story, as he puts it, "correctly."

Ellis, who admits only to "putting deals together" over the past eight years, has hooked up with Sunrise Films Ltd., a Toronto outfit that has produced acclaimed works like Sam and Me, My Secret Identity and Danger Bay.

The Pollard film is still in its infancy — in development, as Ellis puts it — but things are moving. Sterling Siliphant, the Academy Award-winning screenwriter of In the Heat of the Night, has been brought on board, Ellis says.

And Ellis has "loose commitments" from some celebrities who have expressed interest in various parts, including the lead.

With that kind of cachet, Ellis is hoping private investors will put up the $70,000 he estimates it will cost to get the project off the ground and before the cameras. Once that happens, he figures the movie will cost a minimum of $5 million.

Israel Ellis

Terrible injustice

And Ellis leaves little doubt about the project's philosophic approach.

"We see what happened [to Pollard] as a terrible injustice," he told The CJN. Ellis admits he knew little of the case until about a year ago, when he heard Pollard's personal rabbi, the fiery Avi Weiss of New York, speak at a rally.

"When I heard Rabbi Weiss speak, I saw something much bigger than [Pollard] himself. I saw the case as a blatant and obvious attack on Israel and the Jewish people. I was completely thrown off guard and disturbed, but intrigued at the same time."

Ellis began researching the dossier and like many, became convinced Pollard was being subjected to cruel and unusual punishment because he is Jewish and spied for Israel.

Pollard received a life sentence in 1986 and until last June, was in solitary confinement 23 hours a day. That was for passing data to a supposed friend of the U.S. Ellis is quick to note that those caught spying for enemies of America have received more lenient punishments.

Ellis knows too that events may overtake him. It was recently revealed that Pollard has been engaged to Elaine Zeitz of Toronto for the past three years, while U.S. President Bill Clinton is currently considering his plea for commutation of sentence, amid a furious anti-clemency campaign by the CIA, FBI and the Pentagon, which allege Pollard has shown no remorse and in fact has continued to pass classified information in his letters from prison.

(Zeitz told The CJN that Pollard has "totally disavowed" Ellis's project, and she angrily dismissed Ellis as someone who would profit from Pollard's "lifeblood. We have no part or interest in this," she said.)

"What Pollard did took guts," Ellis offers. "He was punished so harshly because he jeopardized the United States' position in the Mideast. He showed the U.S. was denying Israel essential information in order to bring Israel to its knees. You can do a lot of things to the United States, but you can't embarrass it.

"It will take a hell of an outcry to free this man."

If Ellis can get the necessary seed money together over the next two months, he feels the movie can be completed and released in the coming year.

So attached seems Ellis to Pollard's cause that he's already committed a portion of the film's profits to Rabbi Weiss's advocacy group, The Coalition for Jewish Concerns - AMCHA, and to Citizens for Justice for Jonathan Pollard.

But by that time, Ellis is hoping Pollard will need the aid of neither group.

Correction

TORONTO — In the article "BB launches new housing project"(CJN, Nov. 18), it was stated incorrectly that B'nai Brith Canada runs the Upper Canada Lodge building at 4266 Bathurst St.

The building is a project developed and maintained solely by B'nai Brith's Upper Canada Lodge. It is part of both the B'nai Brith Canada and B'nai Brith International networks of affordable housing. The CJN regrets the error.

Joyce Eklove to chair CJC regional plenary

TORONTO — Joyce Eklove has been appointed chair of the 28th Plenary of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, to be held March 19 and 20 at the Lipa Green Building.

The announcement was recently made by Congress regional chair Gerda Frieberg, who also reported that the theme of the plenary will be, Koach: From Strength to Strength. Frieberg noted that the Hebrew letters for 28 spell "Koach" (strength).

In addition, the assembly will celebrate the 75th anniversary of the founding of Canadian Jewish Congress in 1919.

Montreal-born Eklove, who came to Toronto a decade ago, has been chair of the CJC regional committee for Soviet Jewry and head of the bar/bat mitzvah twinning program of then-USSR youngsters with Canadian counterparts. She is co-chair of the World Jewry and International Affairs committee, portfolio chair of the Women's Campaign of Toronto UJA, and a member of the executive of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Joyce Eklove

During the regional assembly, there will be sessions focusing on Canada, the Jewish community, and Israel, she said. "All of these areas will be viewed through Koach — our sources of strength."

The Ontario Plenary takes place every three years between CJC national assemblies. Chair of the plenary program committee is Mordechai Ben Dat, a Congress regional executive member.

As part of the celebration of CJC's 75th anniversary, the Ontario region will honor its past chairs at the plenary luncheon.

Sammy Taft was hatter to the rich and famous

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Sammy Taft

TORONTO — His customers, many of whom became his friends, included Cab Calloway, Bob Hope and Jack Benny. Sammy Taft's Spadina Avenue hat shop was a Toronto institution.

Taft, an institution in his own right, died suddenly of natural causes in North York's Branson Hospital on New Year's Day. He was 80 years old.

Born on Grange Avenue (Dundas and Spadina), Taft attended Ogden Street Public School before beginning his working life peddling men's ties sewn by his mother.

"He had a little red wagon and he loved to go to pool halls," his son Steve told the CJN. "He would put the ties on a pool table and would give someone a wink or tell them he would buy them a Coke, and they would pretend to buy ties. Then others would start to come over and buy for real."

Taft soon earned enough to open a little store during the Depression at 298 Spadina Ave., across the road from Shopsy's Delicatessen. Before long he moved across the road to larger premises, where he stayed for five decades before moving the store one last time to Wilson Avenue just west of Bathurst Street. He worked in the store daily until the day before his death.

Taft turned his attention from ties to hats when an acquaintance of his who was in the hat business brought him some extra hats and asked him if he thought he could sell them.

"When he put a hat in his hands," recalls Steve, "it came alive. He could make it talk." In the 1940s, the "Sammy" was a popular men's hat custom designed by Taft and made for him in New York.

But it was Taft's personal attention that ensured customer loyalty. "There was definitely an art," said his daughter Rhoda Levitan. "People would line up and wait. When [customers] came to that store, it was an experience.

"If someone wanted a grey hat or a small brim and he thought they needed something else, he'd say no. He'd work with them and talk to them. He didn't care if 10 other men were waiting. Nobody got rushed."

In fact, said Levitan, her father would turn down sales if someone came in to purchase a gift for someone he had never seen. He preferred to fit a hat himself to suit the recipient's face and head.

An avid sports fan and former mascot for the Ottawa Senators hockey team (in 1927, when he was 13 years old), Taft was recognized in the NHL Hockey Hall of Fame for having brought the term "hat trick" into popular sports usage.

In 1939, the story goes, Chicago Black Hawks rookie Alex Kaleta went to Taft's store to buy a hat for good luck before a game against the Toronto Maple Leafs. Not having enough money, Kaleta told Taft he would return the next day for the hat. "I'll give you the hat for free if you score three goals against the Leafs," Taft told him.

That night Kaleta scored four goals, and Taft extended his offer of a free hat to any NHL player scoring three goals at Maple Leaf Gardens.

Taft's life was the subject of a 1990 play, Sammy Taft World Famous Hatter. Taft himself did stand-up comedy on occasion and was known as a perpetual kibbitzer.

A funeral was held at Adath Israel Synagogue, of which Taft was a longtime member. He leaves his wife of 51 years, Belle, children Elaine, of California, Steve, Judy Siegel and Noah, all of Toronto, and Rhoda Levitan, of Ottawa, and nine grandchildren. He is also survived by a sister, Dorothy Kantor.

Simon was leading labor leader

Harry Simon

TORONTO — Harry Simon, a longtime labor leader in Toronto, died recently at Baycrest Hospital. He was 84.

Simon was "a real hero to many of us, a pioneer of the Jewish Labour movement and a builder of social democracy in this country," wrote Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella in a condolence letter to the family.

He was particularly proud of having served on the Ontario Medical Services Insurance Enquiry Commission in the early 1960s, his son Morris told the CJN. Recommendations for a universal health insurance plan contained in his minority report were later adopted by the provincial government.

Simon was also a member of the Enquiry Commission on Hospital Disputes in Ontario and served on the Ontario Council of Health from 1966 to 1972.

Born in a shtetl in Ukraine in 1909, he immigrated to Canada with his parents and two younger brothers in 1923.

He attended school in Toronto, then at 17 began working in a fur factory, a move which led to his long career as a unionist.

By the age of 20, he was the youngest business agent ever elected by a union in Canada (the International Fur Workers Union).

In 1937, in his late twenties, Simon was a provincial candidate for the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation party, the predecessor of the New Democratic Party. Ontario premier Bob Rae was among those who eulogized Simon at his funeral.

Following a 12-year stint as Canadian representative for the American Federation of Labor, during which time he organized local unions, he joined the Canadian Labour Congress in 1956. He retired in 1974 after 16 years as Ontario regional director of organization.

Simon's activities in the human rights field included service as vice-chair of the Toronto Labour Committee for Human Rights and as national chair for the Jewish Labour Committee of Canada.

An active member of the Labour Zionist Movement of Canada from the time he joined the left Poale-Zion youth movement in 1926, he served most recently as LZM president. He was also a member of the national executive of Canadian Jewish Congress and worked actively for Histadrut, the Federation of Labour in Israel.

Simon received the City of Toronto's award of merit for distinguished public service, and was given a place of honour in the Labour Hall of Fame in 1991.

"Harry Simon probably embodied the finest example of a synthesis of concern for human rights in its broadest sense and at the same time an equal concern for the future of Jewish survival and the rebirth of our people in an independent, free and democratic Israel," said Julius Sokoloff of the Labour Zionist Movement at Simon's funeral.

Simon leaves his wife of 63 years, Eva, sons Morris and Norman, four grandchildren, two great-grandchildren and brothers William and Myer.

Former IDF parachutist lands position with Habonim Dror

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A published poet and former IDF parachutist, Orit Praag brings a unique perspective to her new position as shlicha (emissary) for Habonim Dror, the Labor Zionist youth movement affiliated with the United Kibbutz Movement.

More pertinent to Praag's new position is her background as a lifelong kibbutznik and her experience as a youth leader, teacher and mother of three boys who are now 9, 7 and 4 years old.

After receiving her bachelor's degree in literature and philosophy from Haifa University, Praag spent a year working for the United Kibbutz Movement newspaper as a writer and researcher.

In 1982 she went to London, England where she ran a "kibbutz club" offering Jewish cultural activities for young Jewish adults, particularly those who had returned from programs in Israel.

Barry Praag, a native Londoner, was one of the members. They married a year after Orit arrived in London, and returned to Israel in 1984 to make their home at Kibbutz Dafna, located at the foot of Mount Hermon.

While in Toronto, Barry is volunteering at the Kibbutz Aliyah Desk and the Labour Zionist Alliance.

Orit sees her role in Toronto as one of an "informal educator" for Habonim Dror, sharing her own connections to Jewish culture and Jewish history. She is also a "voluntary coordinator" for Na'amat, the women's branch of the Labour Zionist Movement. "Na'amat sees Habonim Dror as their future," Praag explained in a recent interview.

Habonim Dror has five chapters and a summer camp, Camp Gesher, in Ontario. The organization also runs a summer program for teens in Israel.

Praag's plans as shlicha include working closely with the Toronto "Ken" (chapter) of Habonim Dror, which has a long history in Toronto. Although the Ken has remained active, programs have not been held as frequently as in its heyday, when weekly activities were the norm. Praag envisions a return to that level of activity.

Orit Praag

During the intensive training that is mandatory for all shlichim, Praag came to believe that one of her main tasks would be to strengthen the connection between Israel and the Diaspora. She has found, however, that "the ties [between Toronto and Israel] are very strong," and she now sees her main function as more of a resource person.

In addition to bringing an Israeli flavor to holiday celebrations and other activities, Praag has put together a 20-minute slide show depicting kibbutz life and is looking forward to "a lot of conversation.

"We have all the latest luxuries on the kibbutz," she said. "I've got a computer, a VCR. We don't have a dishwasher in our house, but my neighbor does. We feel part of the Western world."

She is very gratified to be part of the "new system" of kibbutzim, where children live with their parents. As a child, Praag slept in the kibbutz children's house.

"I'm glad that the system has been changed," Praag said. "Many times when my children cried at night, it felt so good to be near them. It's very important for me that the children grow up with me."

Domestic life and universal women's issues feature in Praag's book of Hebrew poetry, whose title translates as Chasing After Trivialities. On her kibbutz, she organized monthly discussion circles on women's issues.

Praag is cautiously optimistic about the peace process. "It took me a long time to understand it," she said, "because for such a long time we were talking about peace in such an abstract way.

"I've got a lot of fears, but I want peace. From the day my [first] child was born, there hasn't been a day I haven't thought about [my sons'] security when they go into the army. A lot of people want change, but reactionary groups always sound louder."

McMaster Jewish students group to host second CUP conference

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — McMaster Jewish Students Association (MJSA) will host the second CUP (Council of University Presidents) Conference of the academic year on Friday, Jan. 14 and Saturday, Jan. 15.

Held twice a year in the fall and winter, the CUP Conference brings together presidents and two or three delegates of Jewish student groups from "smaller campuses," i.e. all campuses except U of T and York University, in Toronto, explains MJSA director, Sheila Freedman.

Students from Western, Queens, Windsor, Waterloo, Guelph, Brock, Lakehead, Laurentian and Trent universities are expected to attend.

The conference is held under the auspices of the Canadian Jewish Congress and organized by Susan Jackson, director, Communications, Service and Youth Action, who will also conduct the conference.

The aims and objectives of the conference, Jackson told Freedman, are to provide "an opportunity for campus leadership from across Ontario to meet, network and program."

The goal, she added, is to strengthen the students' own Jewish identity as well as their leadership skills.

The site of the conference will be Adas Israel Synagogue, and students "will be housed with our students," says Freedman.

On Friday evening there will be a Shabbat dinner provided by Congress, and on Saturday there will be a lunch. Sessions will run throughout the day between services, but attendance at services is optional says Freedman. Also, students will be free to attend services at the Conservative Beth Jacob Synagogue or Reform Temple Anshe Sholom if they wish.

The conference will conclude with a seudah shlishit, to be followed by an elegant, semi-formal dance hosted by the McMaster students at the Jewish Community Centre.

The dance will be open to all Jewish students on nearby campuses. "We hope," says Freedman, "that they will in fact come."

President of the MJSA is Fran Morris, who heads a "very active group" this year, reports Freedman.

Conclave helps teens prepare for Israel

TORONTO — After seeing the impact of a regional Canadian Jewish Congress project on her brothers, Burlington teenager Sarah White could barely wait her turn to participate in the three-year program.

White, 17, was one of 26 Jewish teenagers living in small communities who came together for a recent three-day conclave sponsored by the Outreach Education Project of Congress' Ontario region. The conclave, which focused on Israel, was to help the group prepare for a five-week study tour of Israel this summer. It is the final year of the program.

"I very much wanted to participate in this program because my brothers Sheldon and Mike were transformed by their involvement [in the program]," said Sarah. "Michael became a totally different person — especially after his return from Israel. His outlook on his Jewish heritage and religion was changed."

The recent conference was one of two the project holds each year of the program. White said she learned a lot about Israel from the videos, speakers and discussion groups.

"I did not realize how small an area Israel occupies, and how precarious a situation it is in, surrounded by Arab countries."

Shawn Brown, 16, of North Bay said the Outreach project has "really increased my knowledge about Israel and Judaism. Before, I only knew the basics. Of course, it's also great to be able to meet and share experiences with other guys who are also living in small communities."

Larry Pogany, 14, of Oakville, whose sister Sharon participated in last year's program, said "the best part of the program is meeting Jewish kids from a similar background in small communities. We have bonded together as a group despite this being only our fourth get-together. We are really looking forward to Israel."

Owen Sound teenager Jill Weinger, 16, said she had very little Jewish education before joining the project. "In this program, we have been taught about our history, culture and heritage. We learned how to be proud of who we are, and to respect the people who went before us and made all this possible.

"And we have developed close friends who I know I will be in contact with for the rest of my life. . . . There is a spiritual kind of feeling in this group."

Susan Jackson, whose community services and youth activities department supervises the Outreach Education Project, said the 26 teenagers have become close. "Now that we are two years into the program, the group has jelled into a cohesive unit — one extremely enthusiastic about the forthcoming trip to Israel."

Participants were housed in Toronto homes by volunteer families. Other help was provided by Daniel Fine, Ronda Drash-Shorfer, Risa Leibl, Marc Kemper and project co-ordinator Allison Kemper.

TORONTO SUPPORTERS AID SHAARE ZEDEK

Dr. Michael Kaplan, Shaare Zedek Neonatology Intensive Care Unit, explains a life-saving procedure to visitors from Toronto, Dr. David and Sharon Gordon. The Gordons visited the renowned Centre recently to dedicate a plaque to their grandparents.

Reisler's music reflects life

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Taken to the Hebrew Orphan Home in Montreal as a child of three, and later shunted between 12 Jewish foster homes until her teens, Annie Reisler, now 62, and living in Toronto, has 20 recorded songs to her credit.

Though she has had no training, and plays the piano with only one finger of her right hand, Reisler has composed pieces reflecting her life experiences which are played on AM and FM radio. A new album, Twilight Odyssey, is to be released this month.

When she was 12, she banged out a tune on the piano in her then foster home, but the foster mother said she was making too much noise. She didn't take to music seriously until three years ago when her second husband, Syd Thomas, gave her a keyboard as a birthday gift.

"I'm going to compose songs until I get worn out and have nothing more to say," said Reisler.

A lot of what she has to say comes from a life which saw her and her brother, Ruby, taken to the orphanage from their working-class home because her mother had to go into hospital.

Her father, Bernard Reisler, a house painter, was unable to care for them and a younger sister, Etta. Reisler did not see her father for years at a time and her mother, Bluma, died in hospital in 1968. However, her father did attend her first wedding in Montreal, (a marriage which lasted 18 years). Her father died in 1984 at the age of 85.

Today, Reisler has two children living in Toronto, Shelley Bleikman and Stanley Greenberg, and six grandchildren, Blake and Bond Bleikman, and Beverley, Shaina, David and Michael Greenberg.

One of her songs was inspired when grandson Blake, only two at the time, said, "I love you," to his grandmother.

Seated at her keyboard in a melancholy mood one day, the melody of Solitude flowed out through her fingers, and the memories of her orphanage days came tumbling out. This was the song that started her career.

Frank Mills was so impressed with Solitude that he wrote a special arrangement of it under the title of Reminiscing With You for his new Homeward album.

At the recording studio, Reisler's rudimentary notes have to be transcribed by a pianist to a musical scale and a synthesizer-enhanced record then results.

Reisler's Twilight Odyssey is obtainable from Music Box Dancer, (416) 475-1848 or IDAC, toll free, 1-800-563-7234.

Activist Gold aided Baycrest

TORONTO — Nathan Gold, a leading Toronto clothing manufacturer, retailer and community activist, died in his sleep last month. He was 81.

Born in Lagow, Poland in 1913, Gold came to Canada at age 15 and worked as a sewing machine operator. He established and operated Paradise Waist, a manufacturer of children's and women's wear, until his retirement in 1967.

In that year, he became a partner in Town and Country, the retail chain, until his final retirement in 1989.

Gold helped start the men's service club at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. He chaired Baycrest's admissions committee, served on its board and was Baycrest's Man of the Year in 1963.

Gold was "a man of great strength but quiet. He preferred to work in the background," said friend Sam Ruth, now a consultant to Baycrest.

Gold was also on the board of the Primrose Club and was active in the United Jewish Appeal.

He leaves his wife Eva, two daughters, six grandchildren and three great-grandchildren. He was predeceased by two granddaughters.

Beit Rayim marks first year

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

RICHMOND HILL — Members of the former Shaareh Haim Congregation, the only synagogue in Canada to go broke during the recession, have managed to pick up the pieces — to the extent they will celebrate the first anniversary of their reborn shul.

Members of Beit Rayim Synagogue will kick up their heels with dancing, live music, refreshments and comedy on Jan. 22, beginning at 8 p.m., to mark the congregation's first birthday.

The synagogue numbers about 75 family members, a far cry from the 300 families who belonged to Shaareh Haim, but as Beit Rayim executive member Irving Siegel puts it, "it will take time for the community to put its faith back into us."

For many observers, it's a minor miracle Beit Rayim exists at all. When Shaareh Haim folded in June 1992 when a debt restructuring plan fell apart after four months of negotiations, it left a lot of Conservative Jews north of Steeles Avenue disaffected and isolated. Some joined Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill; others remained unaffiliated.

But the real shocker came when United Synagogue Day School (USDS), which had maintained a campus within Shaareh Haim, purchased the building last March from the mortgage holder, the Royal Bank, which had listed it in a power of sale.

For some synagogue members, the whole affair left a bitter taste. USDS was viewed by many as having waited for the shul to go broke before buying the building out from under the congregation.

But a core membership of Shaareh Haim regrouped as the York Region Conservative Jewish Community (YRCJC). A year ago, they received a new charitable tax number, renamed the shul Beit Rayim (House of Neighbors) and last autumn, affiliated with Beth Sholom Synagogue on Eglinton Avenue, meaning it has access to Beth Sholom's facilities and is led by its rabbi, Irving Brandwein.

Ironically, the congregation never left Shaareh Haim's site, at 9711 Bayview Ave., although at one point, the bank changed the building's locks when it acted on its power of sale.

Slowly, Shaareh Haim's remnants have gotten back onto their feet. Beit Rayim is a "full-service" shul (even though Shabbat services are every two weeks), has a full-time chazzan, Paul Morden, adult Hebrew classes, and regular simchas.

Families pay $800 a year to join, with a portion of that going to Beth Sholom. But Siegel says the affiliation with Beth Sholom is temporary until Beit Rayim hits the "magic number" of between 125 and 150 family members.

For information on the bash, call (905) 770-7639.

Mezuzah alert launched

TORONTO — Warning! Your mezuzah may need immediate attention.

This slogan is part of a Chabad Lubavitch awareness campaign to alert the public that some mezuzot are not kosher.

"Regretably more than 50 per cent of the mezuzot posted are unfit," said Rabbi Mendel Bernstein. "A mezuzah has to be written on parchment by a certified scribe. Unfortunately the marketplace is full of paper and printed copies."

Chabad Lubavitch has declared February Mezuzah Awareness Month. The organization will offer below cost discounts on mezuzot, checkups and free decorative transparent cases.

The mezuzah contains two Torah portions: Shema and Vehaya (Deuteronomy 6:4-9, 11:13-21). A properly written mezuzah has 22 lines and is governed by almost 500 regulations.

In addition to periodic checkups, mezuzot must be posted correctly. Chabad Lubavitch rabbis and volunteers will visit homes and help post mezuzot properly.

For further information and to make arrangements for a checkup please call 731-7000.

Shore quietly helped others

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Max Shore was a man who gave generously of his wealth and his time but shunned the spotlight. Shore passed away on Dec. 22 at the age of 82.

He was motivated by his concern and love for people, according to his son Charles.

Although a generous supporter of Jewish communal organizations and medical facilities and universities in North America and Israel, it was the little things Shore did that touched the hearts of many people.

He would quietly pay the university tuition of needy students or help out individuals in financial need. He visited the Sharon Home, Winnipeg's Jewish seniors home, to see how he could help individual residents.

Born in Romania, Max Shore came to Manitoba with his family while still a youngster. He began his working career in the family grocery store in rural Manitoba. He built his fortune in the garment industry as the founder of Rice Sportswear Ltd. and Knit-Rite Mills.

A strong supporter of Israel, Shore was recognized as a Founder by Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, the Technion University and the Shore Kindergarten in Nazareth. He was also honored with membership in the Prime Minister's Club of Israel and the State of Israel Bond Drive Scroll of Honor.

In 1984, Shore was the Negev Dinner honoree. "He was not sure why he agreed to it," said son Charles. "He never felt the need for public thank-yous."

One of his most important contributions to the Winnipeg Jewish community was the $1 million he gave to start the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. Most recently, he gave an equally generous gift to the Campus Project, a project which his son said was very important to him.

"He supported synagogues and educational institutions throughout North America," said Charles Shore. "He loved to help people."

Jewish Singles Registry - triple the fun

If you've been wandering around in a love desert, maybe it's time to take the initiative and do something about that drought in the romance department. Instead of just waiting and hoping for that one elusive person-of-your-dreams to come along, why not assert yourself and make it happen.

Maybe it's time for something a little different. Something non-threatening. And fun. Like the Jewish Singles Registry.

With offices in Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa, the Jewish Singles Registry is the largest service of its kind, anywhere in Canada.

The extensive membership roster includes quality single people representing all age groups, equally divided between men and women.

Members can easily network with each other from all three cities and do so on a regular basis.

"Many serious long-distance relationships have developed over the past year and we expect to have one, maybe even two marriages in the not too distance future," says Dora Korzinstone, the Registry's initial founder. "Expansion plans are even underway to expand the network to other cities across the country."

Unlike those promise-you-everything, deliver-next-to-nothing expensive match-making services, the Registry is a community-based organization that allows members to select for themselves the persons they wish to meet. No computers. No astrology. No psychic intuition. No mistakes. Because you do the choosing, what you get is what you see.

Applicants complete a questionnaire defining their personality, interests, hobbies, values and goals, as well as those qualities they are seeking in a prospective partner. This information, along with a photograph and the member's first name only, are entered into the Registry book. Members are then invited to schedule a private appointment to browse through the book and select the people to whom they would like to be introduced to.

The Registry will contact the person selected, allowing them to likewise view the information of the member who has chosen them. The service is strictly confidential and both parties must agree before any telephone numbers are disclosed.

Whether it's long distance or a local relationship, now you can read, learn all about and actually see what the other person looks like before any introduction is made. What more could you ask for from a service. . .

The Jewish Singles Registry is an introduction service like no other. It's honest. Straight forward. And very affordable. With no unwelcome surprises. Best of all, because you do the choosing — no date is a blind date.

For more information about the Jewish Singles Registry please call: in Montreal — 514-937-2049; in Toronto — 416-398-7068; in Ottawa — 613-592-9797.

Gourmet Kosher Cuisine at Hyatt Regency Acapulco

Acapulco, Gro. Mexico ... Set in the best spot in the hotel, right next to the pool, the Kosher Restaurant in Hyatt Regency Acapulco has proven to be a great success among the members of the Jewish community.

Supervised by Rabbi Antebi Meir, Member of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada, and Member of the Maguen David Community in Mexico City, Jewish guests are treated to the best in kosher cuisine, featuring an array of dishes, inclusive of full dairy Breakfast Buffet, with a selection of Kosher cheeses, freshly sliced fruit and squeezed juices, waffle station, blintzes and more.

For Lunch and Dinner, a contemporary meat menu with sandwiches, salads, soups and light main courses such as Lamb Chops, Grilled Chicken Salad and freshly caught Pacific Seafood are some of the delicacies offered for your enjoyment.

For Shabbat, a traditional dinner is offered on Friday nights, featuring specialties such as a selection of appetizers, such as Red Snapper Ceviche, Sauteed Chicken Livers with Apples and Sweet Wine Sauce or Chicken Consommé with Kneidlach. Main courses feature such items as Roast Stuffed Half Chicken with Pepper Sauce or Prime Rib with natural juices, or Grilled Salmon Steak with Lemon.

On Saturdays, a special buffet for lunch with a full salad bar and a choice of 3 main courses is served, such as Duck in an Orange Sauce, Brisket of Beef with Mushroom sauce or Cholent.

Food is served with the traditional Challah and with Kiddush Wine.

Of course, desserts can not be forgotten, and Apple Strudel and Pecan Pie are considered the favourites.

For your convenience, Prayer service is available on the premises everyday.

Its 693 rooms in a landmark tower soar 23 stories above the golden sand that ring Acapulco Bay - the Hyatt Regency is grand and beautiful.

The beach is frolicking. It's the place to learn to waterski, sail, or to wander off and explore the bay in a tiny speed boat. The adventurous will want to try flying without jumping from a plane. In Acapulco it is called parasailing.

Its four restaurants, four bars, Tennis Club with five flood lit courts and water sport facilities, will make your stay in Acapulco even more pleasant.

According to many, sundown is when Acapulco is at its very best. Nightlife starts late and goes on and continues until nearly dawn. Many of Acapulco's finest restaurants, night clubs and discotheques are within walking distance of the Hyatt Regency.

BILL GLADSTONE'S

EYE ON ARTS

Known to television audiences for her role in the taut newsroom drama E.N.G., Toronto actress Theresa Tova has been winning recognition lately in the city's Jewish community as a singer of jazzy nostalgic songs in both English and Yiddish.

Last year, she sang at major events for the Yiddish Film Festival, the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, the Jewish Genealogical Society and the Friends of Yiddish. Although production of E.N.G. may soon take a hiatus, Tova's career shows no signs of doing the same.

On the horizon are more performances in the Jewish community, involvement in a proposed Yiddish TV channel, and singing gigs around town. Every second Sunday, Tova performs and introduces new talent at the Queen's Bedroom, a club on Markham Street. The evening is called T. Tova: Shooting Stars. (She sings in Yiddish by request.)

The daughter of Polish war refugees, Tova was born in Paris and came to Canada as a child. She grew up in Calgary, spoke Yiddish as her first language, and graduated as Yiddish valedictorian from that city's I.L. Peretz school. Now in her mid-thirties, she is the mother of two children, aged 9 and 7.

"When I went into labor with my children, I couldn't speak English," she recalls. "I couldn't speak anything but Yiddish, my mother tongue. That's how engrained it is."

Tova is proud to speak the Yiddish her parents taught her. "I'm a Polish Jew. I think some people want me to speak a more high-brow Yiddish, but my Yiddish is what it is. I'm my parent's child and that's what I speak."

Won over by her vibrant renditions of I Am a Border By My Wife, Mein Shtetele Belz and other Yiddish delights, yearning fans have sent her sheet music for lesser-known tunes like Hefschel the Thief. "I've been learning new things," she days. "People always tell me that I'm bringing the music into today's world, I'm going new life to these songs."

Tova appears occasionally at other clubs around town, almost always with good piano accompaniment. Her next feature gig is Jan. 28 at The Treehouse on Church Street.

Dancer-choreographer Sula Saltzman recalls that her family held a Passover "freedom seder" about 30 years ago with a black minister and his family. She also remembers that her father, a rabbi, went to Alabama with Martin Luther King Jr. at the height of the civil rights demonstrations.

Recently Saltzman, artistic director of Me'irim Dance Company, collaborated with Trinidad-born dancer Patrick Parson on People Like Us, an exploration of the relationship between Jews and blacks. People Like Us ventures into the collective history of persecution and prejudice shared by the two communities. It also delves into the enmities that sometimes erupt between Jews and blacks despite their history of solidarity and commonality. Saltzman and Parsons use dance, poetry and drama as a springboard for the constructive exchange of ideas.

They use stereotypes unabashedly: a stinging comic duet between Shylock and Aunt Jemima provides keen-edged satire. Toronto writer Malca Litovitz injects a biting and bold text and Ballet Creole's musicians fuse the rich sounds of African and Klezmer traditions.

Matinee and evening performances are scheduled at the Studio Theatre of the North York Performing Arts Centre Jan. 18 and 19. The program includes three other works by Saltzman, two of which contain Judaic themes. Man's Domain (from Sephardic Memories) portrays the expulsion from Spain, and Yerusha explores dimensions of Jewish memory to the music of Srul Irving Glick.

Tickets range from $12 to $16. Discounts are available for students and seniors . Call Ticketmaster, 872-2222.

Random Notes: A show of paintings by water colorist Richard Ungar is on display at the Bloor Y, 750 Spadina Ave.

Ungar's street scenes and landscapes comes from two distinct series of his paintings, Jerusalem and Leaside. The show continues until Feb. 1. For times, call Luni at 924-6211.

Evergon, a photographer known for his richly ornamented large-scale polaroids in a "baroque" style, is lecturing in the Music Room at Hart House on Wednesday Jan. 26 at 7:30 p.m. The evening is presented by the Hart House Art Committee and The Hart House Camera Club.

Pre-Beatles romantic crooner Johnny Mathis has enjoyed an astonishing longevity as a singer.

Perhaps it's just life imitating art. Released in 1958, Mathis's fourth album, Johnny's Greatest Hits, lasted an unprecedented 9½ years on Billboard's top-selling album chart. That record (no pun intended) is still unbroken and is duly noted in the Guiness Book of World Records.

Mathis appears in concert at Roy Thomson Hall on Monday March 14 at 8 p.m. Chances are, if you're a Mathis fan, you won't mind shelling out $38.50 to $60 for tickets.

The recent Swedish film Freud Leaving Home is being show at the Jackman Hall of the Art Gallery of Ontario, Sunday Jan. 16 at 7:30 p.m. It is the first selection of the Toronto Jewish Film Society's 1994 season.

Devor's studio true godsend

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Don't tell sculptor Ruth Devor you can't get messages from the other world, because she did!

After 14 months of a desperate, unsuccessful search for a studio, Devor awoke one morning last June and the name of another sculptor, Betty Beckerman, popped into her head.

"When I called her home I was shocked to discover that she had died two days earlier and her family was sitting shiva," Devor recalled. "It was almost as if this woman was telling me that her studio was available."

She first resisted the idea of working in another sculptor's space, but, after a few months' more of fruitless search, became convinced it was "bashert" that she take over the lease for the commodious (650 square feet) studio in Thornhill.

"It was bizarre that Betty Beckerman's name came into my mind out of nowhere because I had not spoken to her for four or five years. Her family was astounded when I called. She was an acquaintance, introduced to me by a mutual friend, and we were supposed to go on a trip together to the quarries of the Tuscany area of Italy where Michaelangelo obtained the marble for his sculptures. But her husband became ill and she couldn't go."

The new studio was indeed bashert for Devor, who had sold a home in the Bathurst and St. Clair area after a divorce, and was living "like a gypsy" with friends or relatives, while she tried to find a house with a studio, and when that proved to be too expensive, to find an apartment with a studio nearby.

"I was desperate and this is exactly what I wanted. With a 16-foot ceiling, it is the best studio I have ever had. I now have an apartment at Bathurst and Clarke, only 10 minutes from the studio." It is south of highway No. 7 and west of Bayview Avenue.

For a person who craves the creative experience of sculpting, Devor says the 14-month hiatus occasioned by her divorce and the inablity to use her studio while her former house was on the market was a most trying time.

One reason Devor had such a problem in locating a studio was that her work needs an exhaust system and is often very noisy, so most visual arts buildings were not available, while others were too large or located in non-desirable areas.

With the new studio has come Devor's decision to teach for the first time in a 30-year career of sculpting, one which has seen her art displayed in many galleries in Canada and the United States, and in private collections.

A well-known piece of hers in Toronto is a three-foot-high Italian marble sculpture of two figures entwined under an arch, in the lobby of the fashionable Governor's Hill apartments on Yonge Street near Toronto city limits.

She is enjoying her teaching and looking forward to new classes for adults and teens beginning the week of Jan. 24. "Stone carving is the most challenging art of all and for me it is a very rewarding medium," Devor said.

For information about the classes, call 889-4587.

Film probes beneath family relationships

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Susanne Bier's Freud Leaves Home is a withering portrait of a Swedish Jewish family, the fractious Cohens of Stockholm, who are temporarily united by a birthday party.

The title refers to Angelique (Freud) Cohen, not the great Viennese psychoanalyst. Yet, as the film suggests, Angelique may indeed be in need of some psychiatric assistance.

Angelique (Gunilla Roor) is unhappy, neurotic, rebellious and virginal. "Maybe sex would help," her brother, David (Philip Zanden), a homosexual, observes in all seriousness.

As it happens, he's right. Angelique, who's obsessively attached to her mother, a Holocaust survivor emotionally numbed by her experiences, heeds his advice. As her mother lies dying in a hospital, she picks up a handsome stranger in a bar, and, in a rather frenetic scene uncharacteristic of this quiet movie, beds him. By deflowering her, he helps liberate Angelique from the neuroses which afflict her.

But Freud Leaves Home, whose run at the Cinematheque extends from Jan. 21-27, is much more than a film about a woman whose bonds with her mother, Rosha (Ghita Norby), exceed the bounds of normalcy.

More broadly, it's about a family which, in a sense, is almost dysfunctional.

Angelique and her older sister, Deborah (Jessica Zanden), now married, don't get along because their values are utterly at variance. Deborah, having made aliyah, has become observant, while Angelique remains steadfastly secular. Deborah considers Angelique a "goy," and her parents "Sunday Jews." (Perhaps Bier meant "Saturday Jews.")

Deborah conveys the traits of an intolerant prude. In fact, there is an element of hypocrisy in her personality, as a rendez-vous with an old flame suggests.

The divisiveness within the Cohen clan is further amplified by David's rocky relationship with his father, Ruben (Palle Granditsky), an ineffectual figure who commands little respect.

After all these years, Ruben still flinches from David's homosexuality, and his opinion of his son's business abilities is, in a word, scathing.

It's not hard to understand why David, like Deborah, has left home. Now a permanent resident of Miami, David has escaped the suffocating grasp of his family, only to be caught in its net yet again in Sweden.

Rounding off her portrait of the Cohens, Bier paints a revealing picture of a less than ideal marriage. Outwardly, Ruben and Rosha seem content. But that's just a facade, at least as far as Rosha is concerned.

Rosha treats Ruben somewhat condescendingly, and admits she would have preferred to marry Max, Ruben's suave business partner.

Buttressed by an intelligent script and subtle performances, Freud Leaves Home scores telling points as it probes beneath the troubling exterior of interlocking relationships, and reveals a family in deep conflict.

This is a film which offers more than immediately meets the eye.

* * *

Richard Attenborough's newest movie, Shadowlands, showcases the talents of two high-profile actors, Anthony Hopkins and Debra Winger.

In this beautifully-realized film based on a true romance, the pair portray unlikely lovers. Hopkins is C.S. Lewis, the donnish, reticent, world-renowned Oxford professor, and Winger is Joy Gresham, the aggressive New York Jewish writer.

Now playing at Cineplex Odeon theatres, Shadowlands explores their evolving relationship with restraint and tact. The performances are excellent; the dialogue is intelligent; the sets are magnificent. This is a film one can savor.

Shadowlands, yet again, proves that fine films can be made without gratuitous violence and nudity. When will they ever learn?

Nicola Lipman welcomes challenges on the Canadian theatre scene

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of actor Nicola Lipman's fondest memories is the great zest with which her late mother, the former Lucille Kaminer of Toronto, told stories to friends in Yiddish.

Lipman inherited her love of the stage from her mother, who sang and acted in Toronto under the name of Lucille Cameron, before marrying Arthur Lipman and moving to Vancouver.

Nicola Lipman has the title role of Aunt Hannah in Aunt Hannah Meets Joe River running Jan. 12-Feb. 6 at Factory Theatre (864-9971).

It is a challenging part, portraying a woman locked away for a time in a mental hospital by an abusive husband, but who is rescued by her sister. Her arrival at the sister's home in Ottawa in 1972 coincides with her teenage niece Caroline's first love affair with the charismatic Joe Rivera. A series of dramatic events follow.

Taking on a challenging role is nothing new for Nicola Lipman, a doyen of the Canadian theatre scene, who has been the teacher-sister in Dancing at Lughnasa the volatile Shirley in Shirley Valentine, the querulous Jessie in Night Mother and the matriarch in two of Neil Simon's plays, Brighton Beach Memoirs and Broadway Bound, among many other roles.

Born in Vancouver, she moved to Rio de Janeiro when only a year old, and the family stayed there until she was 12, her father working for Brazilian Traction. Her mother died in 1971. Her father, 80, a retired Vancouver stockbroker, is a full-time mature student at University of British Columbia. A brother, Ted, has spent most of his working life as a Canadian diplomat in the Far East, and is with the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa.

For many years, Lipman had starring roles at Neptune Theatre in Halifax, a city she loves, and where she met husband, Lionel Simmons, a cinematographer. They have been married for 22 years. Three years ago they moved to Toronto because of the film work available here, but Lipman continues to take leading parts in other Canadian cities. For example, she played in Substance of Fire at the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre, a play by Jon Robin Baitz about a generational battle for control in a Jewish publishing family in New York.

"It's such a wonderful play I can't understand why no one has brought it to Toronto," she said.

Now 47, Lipman has no regrets about devoting her working career to the theatre. "I don't make a lot of money by some people's standards but I'm one of the fortunate few in Canada who get by, but even in the good times there is never enough to be able to save money for the other times."

Of Toronto she says, "I like it more than I thought I would. It has a lot to offer."

BERNARD BASKIN

Promises To Keep, by Ernest W. Michel (McClelland & Stewart, $29.99)

This memoir begins with a child's recollection of Kristallnacht when, in 1938, Germans and Austrians systematically burned synagogues and trashed Jewish businesses and institutions.

The author, who lived with his parents in comfortable circumstances in Mannheim, had intimations of things to come. At fifteen, he became an inmate of Auschwitz, spent 674 days in a "man-made hell" and witnessed atrocities by Nazi soldiers and officials including the fiendish medical experiments of Joseph Mengele.

His life was spared when a German officer discovered that he had a fine handwriting and set him to work listing the names of inmates who had been gassed, with the invariable additional information that they died of natural causes.

On a fifteen hour march to Buchenwald in April 1945, he escaped and found eventual refuge with the American army of liberation. He served, eventually, as a correspondent for an allied-sponsored German newspaper at the Nuremburg war crimes trials. Invited to visit Herman Goering in his cell, he found that it was more than he could handle. "On an impulse I bolted for the door and asked the M.P. to let me out. I couldn't take it. I couldn't remain. I had to get away. There was no discussion, not a word was exchanged, no comments or statements were made. I was there, and then I was gone. Period."

Resourceful, intelligent and creative he became, after his immigration to the United States, one of the most successful executives of the United Jewish Appeal, and raised as much as 130 million dollars annually. One of the strangest contributions he received occurred in a western town during his early years of fundraising. It came from a Jewish woman who managed "a house of ill repute." She was astonished when asked to contribute. "I can't believe it. This is the first time it has ever happened to me." Her contribution was as much as the rest of the town had raised together.

Over the past fifty years he has met with Hollywood personalities, American Presidents, and the prime movers of Israel and has absorbing anecdotes to relate about many of them. Among the most generous and helpful of Hollywood figures were Harpo Marx and Jack Benny. Those who constantly refused to make any contribution included Woody Allen and Neil Simon.

Simply written and filled with informative and fascinating material, Promises to Keep, is a worthy addition to the literature of the Holocaust and the subsequent lives of its survivors.

Perspectives On Disability, edited by Mark Nagler (Distributed by Copp, Pitman, Clark)

Some years ago I reported on an indispensable work, intended largely for nurses, physicians, clergy, social workers, professional caretakers and the disabled themselves.

Now in its second edition, with a generous proportion of new material, this wide-ranging anthology covers such topics as sexuality, medical and psychological issues, education, employment and social planning, as well as legal and ethical issues.

The editor, born with Cerebral Palsy, is Associate Professor in the Department of Sociology, University of Waterloo.

Disabled persons entered the 20th century with limited power, acceptance or legitimacy. The 21st century will be different with new patterns of social change, integration and acceptance.

The author reminds us that Moses had a speech impairment and that Franklin D. Roosevelt, Helen Keller and Steven Hawking have astonished society by the depths of their intellectual accomplishments in spite of severe physical afflictions.

This exhaustive anthology of more than 50 articles continues to be a landmark contribution of inestimable value.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

YUCATAN PENINSULA, Mexico — "The main thing to remember," said Pepe our Mexican guide, "is that the Mayans believed in reincarnation. They believed that unless they fed the sun every morning it would not rise."

High on a promontory overlooking Mexico's Yucatan coast, Tulum is the only temple the Mayans built by the sea. Considered holy ground, it was never occupied. But it was the focal point of a thriving city in the jungle — until the day Spanish galleons appeared along with a blood-red sun on the eastern horizon.

Today it is a well-preserved ruin, one of the youngest in Mexico. As at other local temples — Uxmal, Palenque, Chichen-Itza, Coba — the Mayans practised human sacrifices here. The practice appalled even the cold-blooded conquistadors. The Temple of the Descending God, where the natives nourished the sun every morning, must have been an awesome sight to Spanish eyes from across the shallows. Yet they could not approach. Coral reefs encircling the peninsula made a landing impossible, and they had to detour hundreds of leagues, then hack through dense jungle.

Today one rides to Tulum from Cancun in air-conditioned comfort for an hour and a half along an unerringly straight and level two-lane highway hacked out of the bush. Coba, which is closer, was a far more important and historic Mayan city with extensive trade connections. However, as much of it is still overgrown with vegetation, it is more accessible to monkeys and wild boars than to people.

* * *

They are still building temples to the sun in the Yucatan. Twenty-five years ago the place called Cancun was swamp and jungle. Now its stretch of monumental luxury hotels rivals those of Maui, the French Riviera or any beach in the Caribbean. The American Airlines flight from Toronto (which touches down for only an hour in Dallas) flies by this row of toylike architectural wonders as if doing a parade inspection.

By car, one rides for 40 minutes and sees nothing but hotels, restaurants (including the ubiquitous Planet Hollywood) and shopping malls. Hilton, Hyatt Regency, Marriott, Westin and other top-end chains are all represented.

Picking up on native themes, several deluxe properties are shaped like the squat pyramids that now lie in ruins in the jungles. Using an imported theme, an Arab consortium started to build a fantastic Ali-Baba-type inn, with bulbous domes and eastern arches, but ran out of funds. The decaying shell is the region's most contemporary ruin.

Costing $17 million, Xcaret (pronounced Ish-car-et) is a recently-constructed amusement park situated midway between Cancun and Tulum. Trucks and bulldozers are still laboring by the entrance to build a mini-volcano — an artificial addition as opposed to the genuine Mayan ruins that grace the well-landscaped park.

Although Disneyesque in conception and scope, Xcaret caters to the ecological ethos of the 1990s. This is the place to be if you care to float lazily down an underground river or swim with gentle and intelligent bottlenose dolphins. Xcaret's dolphin compound is better designed than others in Maui and Nassau. The cost of swimming with dolphins is $60 for an hour. Chitzen-Itza, a 2½-hour drive westward from Cancun, is a vast complex of well-preserved pyramids, temples, rows of columns, ossuaries and sacrificial platforms. Dating from the seventh century, it is one of the most spectacular and celebrated ruins of antiquity.

"Canadians know all about the beaches of our country, and that's what we try to push," says Tony De Anda, head of the Mexico Government Tourist Office in Toronto. "But I also want Canadians to know the other face of my country. So much culture! You don't have to go to Europe to see this culture — it's right here in North America."

Like Canada, Mexico is geographically diverse, possessing idyllic beaches, colonial towns, populous high-altitude plateaus, volcanic mountains, farming regions, deserts and uncharted jungle. Its capital, Mexico City, has a population of 28 million — equal to all of Canada.

Secondary cities like Guadalahara, with a population of merely five million, offer colourful surprises like Tlaque-Paque, a delightful handicrafts district filled with fine galleries and artisans' shops. According to De Anda, most of the half-million Canadians who visit Mexico each year come for the sun, sand and sea. Cancun is their favoured destination, followed by Acapulco, Puerto Vallarta and Ixtapa.

Another popular sun destination, especially among golf and tennis enthusiasts, is Palm Springs, California. Situated about 160 km southeast of Los Angeles, Palm Springs grew around a stagecoach stop established in 1874. Its population barely topped 40,000 in the last census.

A Palm Springs tour company, Desert Adventures, is offering nature tours of the desert via foot and four-wheel-drive jeep. Participants explore the desert's flora and fauna, as well as petroglyphs, cooking pits and other traces of ancient native American communities. Other things to do in the area include horseback riding, desert camp-outs, hot-air ballooning, and riding in a covered wagon mule drive. There's even an ice skating rink in nearby Palm Desert, though few Canadians (Wayne Gretzky excepted) would take skates to California. NEW HOLIDAY INN

An IDF helicopter flys over the Wohl Rose Garden opposite the Knesset. In the background is the Holiday Inn Crowne Plaza Hotel, formerly the Hilton Hotel. While the change in ownership leaves the Hilton without a hotel in Jerusalem, a new Hilton is planned to be built by the Old City Wall as part of the new multi-million dollar Mamilla project. 1993's Yearly Gain

ISRAEL — Propelled by the Oslo agreement, the Israeli stock market showed an overall yearly gain of 41 per cent during 1993. After adjustment for inflation, the real gain was estimated at 26 per cent.

Analysts said there was no reason to consider the market overpriced at present and did not predict a fall. This year's increase was some 50 points lower than the exceptional 75 per cent real gain posted last year.

The country experienced a growth rate of 3.5 per cent the second highest among OECD nations. However, high inflation prompted the Bank of Israel to announce an interest rate rise of one per cent.

The value of industrial exports went up by 18 per cent in 1993 to $10.1 billion.

The China Connection

TEL AVIV — Israel will soon start importing coal from the People's Republic of China.

Israel currently imports about 5.5 million tons of coal a year from four countries including South Africa, Israel's largest supplier.

Israel has been converting from oil to solid fuels, including coal, to produce electricity.

In the last few months, Israel and China have exchanged economic delegations to explore joint commercial projects and trade relations.

Signed And Nearly Delivered

JERUSALEM — Tadiran Telecommunications and Canada's Newbridge announced they will be signing a joint marketing co-operation and research and development agreement.

The agreement allows the companies to integrate Tadiran products into Newbridge systems and vice versa. It also provides for the two companies to market the other's products.

For the past four years the firms have co-operated in marketing integrated products in Israel. Newbridge has also marketed Tadiran's products in the North and South American markets.

Newbridge's multiplexing voice and data equipment has helped Tadiran win contracts from Israel's national phone company, Bezek, and the Israel Postal Authority for building data and voice communications networks. Newbridge's turnover is expected to be around $500 million this year, according to Tadiran.

Interest for Free

TORONTO — Holders of 15-year State of Israel Development Issue Savings Bonds purchased in 1979 and 1980 at four per cent can earn a year's worth of interest for free.

Through the advanced reinvestment program, Bondholders are credited with a full year's worth of interest if they reinvest unmatured Bonds in year 14 of the 15-year term.

Israel Bonds, recently deemed eligible for Self-Directed RRSPs, had a record year in Canada with 1993 sales exceeding $100 million (US).

* * *

Banking on Co-operation

TEL AVIV — Bank Hapoalim recently announced direct working relations with eight banks in Egypt, including the National Bank of Egypt, that country's major banking group.

Hapoalim officials report a significant increase in two-way Israel-Egyptian commercial activity due to the improved political relations between the neighboring countries. The Israeli economy will realize immediate benefits, they note, just through direct payment through the National Bank of Egypt for considerable oil imports.

Bank Hapoalim also reports new ties with the largest bank in Morocco, the government-owned Banque Marocaine du Commerce Exterieur. This bank also selected Bank Hapoalim to helped launch its activities with Israeli banking interests.

Secure Retirement Fund

TORONTO — The Canadian Association of Retired Persons (CARP) has launched the third printing of its Financial Planning Workbook , prepared by Graham Byron CFP and Warren MacKenzie CA.

In 15 well-laid out chapters, Byron and MacKenzie present a clear, easy-to-follow method of analyzing one's financial postition, with a step-by-step outline of how to plan for a secure retirement fund.

The book is designed with the lay person in mind, covering the inflation factor, types of invesment, how to minimize risk and select the right balance and much more.

Cost of the book is $12 to the public or $7 for members of CARP.

Promotion Fund On Target

TEL AVIV — Bank Hapoalim's largest program for the advancement of small- and medium-size businesses is a success story after less than two months in operation.

During that period, the Hapoalim Business Promotion Fund has granted 70 loan requests, three quarters of the applications received. Loans of $250,000 to $330,000 per project come from a $28-million fund.

Meeting the needs of the recent growth in new businesses and expansions in Israel, the Hapoalim credit may also be used for real estate involved in a project and equipment acquisitions.

Poll shows businesses optimistic about future

TORONTO — Despite concerns about the economy and government deficits, Canadian entrepreneurs are looking to build business.

That was the message conveyed by an informal poll taken at a business forum sponsored by Ernst & Young. Ninety-two per cent of those polled said they expect business to improve or remain steady during the coming year.

Of the respondents, 88 percent are planning one or more growth strategies. More than half (57 per cent) said they plan to introduce new products or services; 42 percent said they plan to upgrade technology; and 54 per cent said they plan to expand into new domestic or international markets. Even more encouraging, 24 percent plan to hire more employees in the coming year.

"The confidence of Canadian entrepreneurs is another positive indicator of better times to come for Canada's economy," said Dr. Stephen Tanny, chief economist for Ernst & Young. "Entrepreneurs, like much of the business community, continue to look beyond Canada's near-term economic and political difficulties."

"The vast majority of our entrepreneurial clients continue to reflect a positive growth plan," said Dan Cornacchia, managing partner of the Venture Group of Ernst & Young.

Cornacchia attributes this to improved confidence levels, lower interest rates and rising stock prices making financing more readily available. "We expect this trend to continue and allow entrepreneurs to more aggressively pursue their growth strategies."

Those polled seem to agree. Fully 56 per cent said they believe economic conditions will become more favorable for business next year, 36 per cent think conditions will remain the same, and only eight percent believe conditions will worsen.

JVS aids professional women who were hit hard by recession

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At age 30, Mary Nirenberg thought she had it all. Emigrating from Odessa in Ukraine 18 years ago, she believed her dreams of a comfortable middle- class Canadian lifestyle had finally been achieved. Yet, those illusions were shattered last year when she lost her house, lost her job and divorced her husband.

She went on social assistance. It helped pay the rent and put food on the table for her two young children, but left little else to help turn her increasingly desperate situation around. She became depressed, disallusioned and frightened of what the future held.

"I could not believe this was happening to me," says Mary. "I was a graduate in data entry with years of experience in several businesses. I had worked in banking for six years, certain that my career in the banking industry would last a lifetime. But I became a fatality of the current economic crisis that is plaguing all our institutions today."

Such is the sign of our times that even as many commercial enterprises are declaring record profits, they are concurrently slashing operating budgets and trimming their staffing rosters. Job creation remains several rungs down on the corporate priority list.

Mary's story is not uncommon in this economic scenario. She is part of a growing segment of our unemployed ranks, one comprised of professional businesspeople once well entrenched in their career paths, and now finding themselves thrust on to the welfare rolls.

These are people with a high degree of training and possessing specialized skills, but who remain frustratingly without any definite employment prospects.

"This is particularly hard on Jewish women," adds Mary. "Ours is a strong work ethic and the idea that we must come to accept social assistance (or, as some would say, charity), is a difficult reality to reconcile. If we can not work, and are single mothers as well, we are summarily branded as being either lazy or lacking initiative. But nothing could be further from the truth."

Mary's own attitudes underwent a radical change several months ago when she discovered Women in New Roles (WINR), a service provided by the Jewish Vocational Service (JVS) of Metropolitan Toronto.

As Renée Ruiter-Kohn, JVS director of counselling, explains, "Our clients in WINR are generally professionals and highly skilled women over 30, who would be well established in their chosen careers were it not for the vagaries of today's economic climate."

Federally funded, WINR has been developed by Jewish Vocational Service in partnership with the Ministry of Employment and Immigration as well as Metro Toronto Social Services. It is a relatively new service and one which is evolving as the marketplace changes.

According to Ruiter-Kohn, in the late 1980s JVS was given the mandate to target the disproportionately high welfare population of the Jane/Finch community for a pilot project. Women on chronic social assistance were given the opportunity to enroll in a program that combined the elements of support group networking and life skills enhancements.

With the aid of the North York Board of Education, many of these clients either went on to pursue their education, or found employment, or increased their skills level to better market themselves.

WINR grew out of that initial project with a slightly different mission statement. It remains nonsectarian in enrollment, but its target group has become more defined.

Clients are women on social assistance but must have been out of work for less than three years. They need to have a stable work history prior to being unemployed, be proficient in English, and have a better than Grade 10 education level. Most important, they must make the commitment to attend the intensive WINR program on a full-time basis over a consecutive seven-week period.

The agenda is composed of group and individual counselling, computerized literacy training and learning the latest in job-search methodologies such as networking and resume preparation.

"WINR answers the needs of both the community and government agencies as they have been articulated to Jewish Vocational Service," says JVS executive director Ed Segalowitz. "Attendees in this program are unemployed today, but they have a good employment background and are excellent candidates for quick re-entry into the labor force. All they need is guidance and direction as to how to market themselves to find the jobs that are definitely out there."

Although the program is still in its infancy, preliminary results are amazingly positive. According to Segalowitz, WINR boasts a 70 per cent-80 per cent success rate so far.

"But one must have realistic expectations," Mary explains. "Women enrolling in this program should realize it is not a panacea for all their problems. It is designed to give us back our self-confidence and pride, to piece together the threads of our lives, and so go on to persevere towards our personal ambitions. The one over-riding prerequisite that we all need to derive the benefits of the program is self-motivation. Without that, no program would prove useful."

Mary admits that she is a survivor, and is proud of that fact. She credits Women in New Roles for helping her restore her self-esteem and to realize the potential within herself.

The next WINR program begins Jan. 17. For further information, call (416)398-9036.

Company obtains rights to anti-epileptic drug

JERUSALEM — Two Canadian companies have signed an exclusive, worldwide licensing agreement for an anti-epileptic drug developed at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

The drug, Nuroval SR, is taken orally once a day and controls seizures through 24-hour therapeutic blood levels of sodium valproate. Side effects are lessened by the smoother absorption of the drug into the blood without high peak levels.

The licensing agreement is between the Hebrew University's Yissum Research Development Co. and Canguard Health Technologies Inc. of Vancouver, B.C., and its strategic corporate partner, Pharmascience Inc. of Montreal. Patents are pending in Canada, Israel and Europe, with an application issued in the United States.

The world market share for Nuroval SR, a form of sodium valproate, is estimated at $400 million annually, and is growing at about 15 percent a year. Sales of the investigational drug are expected to begin in late 1993, with general marketing anticipated in late 1995 or 1996.

Spanish monarch receives Israeli high-tech gift

JERUSALEM — Telrad Telecommunications, a provider of digital telephone systems and one of Israel's largest telecommunications companies, recently gave King Juan Carlos of Spain a different type of gift — the gift of telecommunications.

The gift, an advanced digital phone system, was presented to the king during his November visit to Israel, his first visit to the Holy Land as king.

The advanced telephone system was presented to the king by Israel's President Ezer Weizman. The gift was given by Telrad as a goodwill gesture to demonstrate to Spain the quality and sophistication of Israel's rapidly growing high-technology industry.

"Relations between Israel and Spain have improved dramatically during the past 10 years and Telrad is greatly honored with the distinction of being able to present a gift to the king," said Oded Koritshoner, president of Telrad Telecommunications, Inc., the wholly owned U.S. subsidiary of Telrad Telecommunications of Israel.

"When a head of state makes an official visit to Israel, he or she is generally presented with a gift considered representative of Israel — such as a religious or archeological artifact. Clearly, Israel has entered the 'digital age' and the gift of this advanced piece of technology is an indication of Israel's transformation."

In addition to its well-established telecommunications industry, Israel is highly advanced in computers, software, data communications, electronics, bio-technology and imaging technology. The country's primary markets are in North America and Europe. With the collapse of the former Soviet Union, Israeli companies also have been making strides lately in the former Soviet Republics, Eastern Europe and the Far East.

Founded more than 40 years ago, Telrad Telecommunications is a major Israeli manufacturer of telecommunications equipment, including digital telephone systems, integrated voice mail systems, PBXs and ISDN terminal equipment. The company, which will have worldwide sales in 1993 exceeding $250 million, has a customer base that includes small, medium and large size businesses, public institutions, and telephone companies located in more than 30 countries. Since its first U.S. sales in 1978, Telrad U.S., headquartered in Woodbury, N.Y., has installed more than two million telephone stations.

Cut flowers under wraps

By SIMON GRIEVER
Special to the CJN

KIBBUTZ BARKAJ, Israel — An Israeli plastics manufacturer has developed a novel method for keeping cut flowers fresh.

By lining boxes with the usual plastic packing material, Israeli flower exporters are better able to send the millions of flowers, mainly roses and carnations, to Europe each winter.

"The wrapping has a double advantage," said Eliezer Kaynan, director of research and development for the Polyon Company of Kibbutz Barkai. "It lowers the temperature in the boxes by several degrees centigrade and, more importantly, it keeps oxygen out of the containers."

Kayan said the company experimented with various types of plastic and concluded that plastic with air bubbles was the most convenient, clean and effective.

"We researched the optimum thickness of the plastic as well as the best methods for folding and cutting," he said.

"The wrong dimensions and incorrect packing can be counterproductive and may end up damaging the flowers."

Kaynan said retailers and customers have been impressed with the results. "They have remarked on how long the flowers remain alive and attractive, and how they now fetch premium prices on world markets."

Honesty, respect and a little magic will bring us together to share life's exciting journey. Are you that special lady I am destined to meet? I am outgoing, warm, good looking, turn 60, Conservative Jewish prof. businessman, 5'11", 180 lbs. with a youthful demeanour and an exciting zest to enjoy life to the very fullest. A great fan of the arts, love of life, sports car enthusiast, gourmet cooking & travel, all accomplished one day at a time. ARE you an educated, mature, responsible, tall, slim, youthful, sophisticated prof. Jewish woman with a great sense of humour, a positive attitude, who is seeking a special one-on-one serious lifetime commitment with an all -together responsible man who possesses both style and class and is well respected in the business community.
IF so, writing to me enclosing a recent photo will be rewarded with a prompt response. Reply to Box 30070, 1027 Finch Ave. W., Downsview Ont. M3J 3L6.

I know that you are out there. And I wonder about you. What's taking so long? When will I finally see you smile and hear you laugh? I have risked so much in hope of finding you.
I thought that we had met before. The feeling was very strong. And often it lasted quite a while. But it wasn't you. Were you watching and waiting?
I'm ready now. I've done my time and so have you. Let's start.
I'm male, 47, divorced, no children. Once we talk, we'll both know right away. Box 6138 CJN

Meeting addresses Gaucher's Disease

JERUSALEM — The excitement of breaking new ground has been almost routine for some of the physicians who treat patients with Gaucher's Disease (GD) — a lipids storage disorder which particularly affects the spleen, bone marrow and liver, and can cause a number of other medical complications.

The recent advent of Ceredase, a low-dose intravenous enzyme replacement, has been a turning point for many patients suffering from this disease, which occurs most commonly among Ashkenazi Jews.

In a recent symposium held at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre, a number of physicians presented their experiences with patients who have GD. The keynote speaker, Prof. R. Desnick, began with an historical overview of GD from its identification by Felippi Gaucher in 1882 to the present.

Dr. S. Zevin of Shaare Zedek's Dept. of Internal Medicine and Gaucher Clinic, spoke on Gaucher Disease in Children, describing 34 children and adolescents evaluated at the clinic during the past three years. Low platelet counts and anemia were prominent features, and those with a certain type of GD displayed growth retardation, with delayed sexual maturation in the adolescents. Ten of the children are receiving Ceredase, which has proved beneficial in reducing growth retardation.

Dr. E. Kerem of Shaare Zedek's pediatric department spoke on lung involvement in GD. In a study of 79 patients aged 7-66, abnormal pulmonary function was found to be common among GD sufferers.

Low dose of Ceredase seen as best treatment

Dr. A. Abrahamov, also of the department of pediatrics, spoke on a new variant of GD found in three large Arab families in Israel — a very specific type, which shows neurological symptoms, such as peculiar eye movements. As well, all 12 GD patients in the three families have a progressive cardiac problem.

Though it is not yet known if those with the heart problems can be helped with Ceredase, Dr. Ari Zimran, clinic director, is now convinced that a low dose of Ceredase is generally the best choice of treatment, to be initiated before irreversible complications, such as bone lesions, develop. Although doses given too frequently can impair the quality of life and be difficult and painful, most Ceredase patients are now treated at home, with some attending an afternoon hospital clinic.

Today, a century after GD was identified, the outlook is optimistic, with laboratory science and clinical medicine working together to help those with this genetic disease.

BBYO

THE OPPORTUNITY OF A LIFETIME

In more than 1,000 chapters around the world ... in hundreds of communities ... including yours ... Jewish teens are having the time of their lives and ensuring the survival of the Jewish people. The Lake Ontario Region's BBYO program is housed in the JCC North Y branch.

BBYO is the world's largest Jewish youth group. More than half a million teenagers have passed through BBYO ranks - living and learning Judaism, developing leadership skills, participating in social and athletic activities, making a difference in their communities through service.

Do you know a teen whose life could be enriched through BBYO?

One of BBYO'sbest features is the effect it has on teenagers. Teens are offered a challenging, enjoyable and diverse program. They are offered the unique opportunity to gain first hand experience in leadership development and the chance to create and conduct their own programs.

Several times a year teens have the chance to meet Jewish teens from Toronto, other parts of Ontario and the United States. Together they will explore their heritage and share in their experiences - learning a common commitment to the Jewish people and their fellow human beings. A commitment that will last forever.

AZA/BBG GRADS

WE ARE LOOKING FOR YOU

The Hi-Lights

Do you remember the good times that we had at the BBYO House on Spadina Avenue? ... Did you 'hang out' at the Beth Sholom on Sunday afternoons? ... Or the facility upstairs from Revitch's on Eglinton Avenue? ... Or did you meet at the new B'nai Brith House on Hove Street?

Do these places still bring marvellous memories to mind?

We are a group of BBYO alumni, committed to preserving the B'nai Brith Youth Organization for future generations. When we were teens BBYO gave us the opportunity to meet and interact with other Jewish teens, develop our leadership and interpersonal skills, and become involved in community service.

We want to ensure the continuation of an organization that has given us so much in so many ways. We want to ensure that our teens have the same opportunities that BBYO gave to us.

By joining the BBYO Alumni Circle you will be able to regain contact with an important part of your past, and forge a link with the teens that are our future.

If you are interested in joining the BBYO Alumni group, please fill out the bottom portion of this page and return it to our office by mail or fax to, (416) 635-9416. This will enable us to register you on our membership list and send you a copy of our newsletter so that you can keep informed. If you know of any other former AZA/BBG members, kindly send us their names and addresses or ask them to contact us.

Should you wish to become more actively involved by volunteering on one of our Alumni committees, please indicate on the response form below.

Arafat may meet Chrétien

OTTAWA — PLO chairman Yasser Arafat will likely meet with Prime Minister Jean Chretien and Foreign Affairs Minister Andre Ouellet when he visits Canada, probably sometime in the spring.

While no date has been set, officials at the Canadian Embassy in Tunisia are meeting with the PLO to organize the "working visit," said Foreign Affairs spokesman Rodney Moore.

Moore said Canada has committed $55 million over the next five years to support implementation of the peace accord. He said Arafat's visit will focus on co-operation in securing a Middle East peace, on supporting Palestinian autonomy and the development of democratic institutions among the Palestinians.

This will be Arafat's first visit to Canada.

Israel assessing repercussions of summit meeting

JERUSALEM (JPFS) — In his first reaction to the Jan. 16 Geneva summit between U.S. President Bill Clinton and Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told reporters Sunday that Assad had not been as specific on the meaning of peace as Clinton was in their post-conference remarks.

However, he said, the summit would only be evaluated after "Israel closely and carefully studies the contents of the more than five hours of meetings between Clinton and Assad and assesses their implications."

Clinton called Rabin Sunday night, at approximately 9:45 p.m, and briefed him on the talks. Clinton was en route from Geneva back to Washington.

The call came as Rabin was speaking to an AIPAC delegation in Jerusalem. Rabin excused himself, explaining the reason for his temporary departure, and took the call in a nearby room.

The Prime Minister's Office would not comment on the contents of the conversation, but a source close to Rabin said it was a lengthy and constructive one, in which "Clinton told Rabin about his private meetings with Assad." Clinton also called Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

Rabin was to meet with Dennis Ross, the State Department's peace talks coordinator, and Martin Indyk of the National Security Council, who were dispatched by Secretary of State Warren Christopher to brief him on the summit. They were also scheduled to meet Foreign Minister Shimon Peres later Monday morning.

At the joint press conference following the Geneva summit, Assad announced that Syria could have "normal peaceful relations" with Israel under a peace agreement.

Clinton welcomed Syria's attitude to peace and said Israel should respond.

Assad, speaking in Arabic, said in a prepared statement: "We want the peace of the brave, a genuine peace that can survive. If the leaders of Israel have sufficient courage to respond to this kind of peace, a new era of security and stability in which there are normal peaceful relations among all shall dawn."

Clinton described it as "a clear, forthright and very important statement on normal peaceful relations . . . stating clearly that it is time to end the conflict with Israel, make peace with Israel. [It is] the first time that there has been a clear expression that there will be a possibility of that sort of relationship."

Commenting on the press conference, Peres said there was a discrepancy between Assad's statement and Clinton's, as well as a difference between Assad's prepared statement and his answers to journalists' questions.

"Assad did not say 'full peace with all that is implied in the term,' but used vague and ambiguous, although positive, language," Peres said, adding that he hopes that in the private meetings, "clearer things were said. It is vital that we know precisely what was said. At this point, it is difficult to translate Assad's statement into the language of negotiations".

The Geneva summit, Peres told reporters, will not affect talks with the PLO. "If there is an opening with Syria," he said, "we'll try it."

Declaration of principles expected within months

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM— A declaration of principles between Israel and Syria is likely to be signed within a few months, two leading Israeli experts on Syria said following last Sunday's summit in Geneva between U.S. President Bill Clinton and Syrian leader Hafez Assad.

Prof. Moshe Maoz, author of a biography of Assad, predicted that Israel and Syria will reach an agreement of principles within a few months.

"But I wouldn't expect to see the Israeli flag hoisted in Damascus in the near future," added the Hebrew University professor. "This will not happen until Israel has withdrawn completely from the Golan Heights."

Dr. Yossi Olmert, an expert on Syria, also anticipates the signing of a declaration of principles within a few months. This will be followed by a much longer, tedious and difficult period of negotiating the details of the agreement, said Olmert, the former director of the Government Press Office.

He suggested that Israel will probably try to negotiate a withdrawal based not on the June 4, 1967 line, but on the international boundary which lies east of the 1967 line.

Both experts noted that Assad has begun to prepare the Syrian public for a peace treaty with Israel.

"This process began on Sunday," said Olmert, "when Assad allowed the Geneva press conference to be broadcast fully and without censorship on Syrian television. It is significant that the Syrian public heard Assad say that he considers peace with Israel to be a strategic objective."

"Assad has been preparing the Syrian public for peace with Israel in a gradual manner," said Maoz. "Sunday's statements were another step in this direction."

Many Israeli analysts believed the ball is now in Israel's court.

"The onus is now on Israel to show that (it) is serious about peace," said Maoz.

But Prof. Avraham Ben-Zvi, a Tel Aviv University expert in U.S.-Israel relations, disagreed. "I wouldn't interpret President Clinton's words as suggesting that it is now up to Israel to respond. The onus is still on Syria. The American administration does not favor exerting pressure on Israel, but prefers a gradual process. They are being very careful not to run ahead too quickly in order not to weaken [Prime Minister Yitzhak] Rabin. The significance of the summit, from Washington's viewpoint, is that it has provided fuel to get the process moving again."

Demonstrators oppose territorial concessions

JERUSALEM (JPFS) — A chain of demonstrations was held throughout Israel last Sunday to protest against any form of territorial concessions on the Golan Heights.

As U.S. President Bill Clinton and Syrian President Hafez al-Assad met in Geneva, thousands of people took part in the protests at scores of road junctions, stretching from Eilat to Metulla.

Placards and slogans denouncing the government's "concessionary" policies and declaring that "Clinton and Assad will not decide the fate of the Golan" were displayed at the demonstrations.

Scores of people also demonstrated outside the U.S. Embassy in Tel Aviv to protest against alleged U.S. pressure on Israel to withdraw from the Golan in return for peace with Syria.

Project Otzma enhances women's lives

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sheila Weverman came back from 10 months in Israel with a new sense of confidence. So did Kimberly Lewis. Lewis also brought back a fiance.

"I met him on kibbutz and we fell in love," said Lewis, 24. He is Saar Golan, a Canadian volunteer in the Israeli army.

Lewis, originally from New York, moved here after completing Project Otzma, a 10-month volunteer program for 100 North Americans aged 19 to 24. The program is subsidized by participating Federations throughout North America.

Like Weverman, also 24, Lewis had finished university and wanted to spend time abroad, preferably in Israel. Both said they lived "on the fringes" of organized Jewish youth groups during university, but felt a strong connection to Israel.

As part of Project Otzma, they lived on a kibbutz, worked in absorption centres and run-down neighborhoods, taught underprivileged children, and learned to make decisions for themselves.

"There was no one there telling you what to do all the time," said Weverman of her teaching experiences in a youth aliyah school outside Tel Aviv. "We got together ourselves and planned our lessons."

Weverman was one of six Project Otzma volunteers teaching English at the school, home to problem children in grades 9 to 12. She said the hands-off approach from above helped her develop confidence.

"I was teacher, friend, counsellor and mother to these kids — anything and everything," she said from her Toronto home. "I realized I'm capable of doing a lot more than I thought I was."

'I realized I'm capable of doing a lot more than I thought I was.'

Sheila Weverman

The Project Otzma experience also helped Weverman, a sociology graduate from the University of Toronto, realize she wants to teach. Currently working in the marketing department of a large insurance firm, she is tutoring English on a volunteer basis and hopes to apply to teachers' college.

Volunteering seems to be a natural outgrowth of Project Otzma. Peter Freedman, chair of the Toronto Otzma Committee, said the willingness to serve the home community is usually a consequence of selection to the program.

"There is no specific obligation [to volunteer back home]. We pick these people because we think they're driven to find obligations to take on."

Lewis is currently volunteering at a Thornhill elementary school, having studied elementary education at New York University. Like Weverman, she said she learned just as much as she taught on Project Otzma.

"I came back knowing more about Israel, about living in another culture, having learned Hebrew and feeling more responsible."

Among the responsibilities Lewis took on was rebuilding a playground at an Ethiopian absorption centre in Lod, New York City's Project Renewal sister neighborhood (Weverman spent two months in Eilat, Toronto's Project Renewal twin).

Lewis said after arriving at the centre she noticed the children had no equipment to play with. She and the other volunteers drew up a budget and presented it to visitors from their home Federation. They were given $150 in cash, enough to buy paint, tires and ropes for swings. It was built in a week.

"I never built anything before," said Lewis. "The kids were excited, the parents were grateful. You get really creative on the program."

Project Oztma is looking for similarly motivated applicants for this year's program, which runs from August 1994 to June 1995. Cost is $1600 (US) plus airfare. For more information contact Chaia Berkowitz at (416) 631-5661.

West Bank spokesman defends Yesha settlers

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About one month ago, one of Toronto's largest synagogues, Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (BAYT) congregation, twinned itself with the West Bank community of Beit El.

Last week, one of that community's more prominent citizens and spokesmen, Yakov Katz, known affectionately to his friends as Ketzele (small cat), paid a visit to the Thornhill congregation to explain the situation facing the beleaguered settlers in the area known as Yesha — Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

In a recent interview the talk was tough and the rhetoric sometimes bitter. Settlers in Yesha, Katz told The CJN, feel as if they are being ignored and abandoned by the Labor government of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. He described Rabin as "the greatest liar of our generation," and he said government ministeries, once sympathetic to settlers' goals, "have closed their doors to us. There is so much hatred."

Under these circumstances, and with Arab murders of settlers increasing in the wake of the Sept. 13 handshake between Rabin and PLO chief Yasser Arafat, the residents of Yesha have begun to reach out to Jewish communities around the world for both moral and financial support, Katz said.

A four-year veteran of an elite commando unit, Katz said he and former Israeli defence minister Ariel Sharon were in Toronto as part of a two-week North American visit that will see them address supporters in Seattle, Columbus, Ohio, Los Angeles, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and Miami.

"We are encouraging Canadian and American Jewry to help the people who are being ignored by their own government," said Katz, a former deputy housing minister under Sharon.

Katz said that in the four months prior to the historic handshake, no Jews were killed by Arab terrorists, but since then, 25 or more have been murdered, including residents of Beit El like Chaim Mizrachi.

Mizrachi was killed by an Arab merchant from whom he had been buying eggs for years, Katz said. Making the situation even more intolerable is the fact that the killer was associated with Arafat's Fatah wing of the PLO and was slated to become a policeman in the territories once Israeli forces withdrew, Katz said.

The kippah-clad Katz, who walks with a cane as a result of serious leg and hip wounds he received in the Yom Kippur War, said the mood in Israel is turning away from the euphoria that greeted the peace accord. A majority of Israeli Jews now oppose it, he asserted.

Furthermore, Rabin is losing support from across the political spectrum. Even Labor-oriented people in settlements near Jericho and in the Golan Heights who had been reassured by Rabin when he was running for office that their communities were essential for security, now see that Rabin "lied" to get their votes. He held himself out as a tough right-winger but is now changing his tune, Katz said.

'Rabin is losing support'

The prime minister has refused to issue licenses to Jews to expand settlements in the territories, he continued. "Can you imagine that Jews were not allowed to build on Bathurst Street?" he asked. "It's the only place in the world that Jews are not allowed to build. It's even worse than under the British."

The settlements are suffering from a dropoff in government support, he added. Where once settlements received "everything we needed," now they face a government "work to rule" campaign, with authorities providing only the barest of necessities that are required by law.

Asked whether the opposition to the peace accord could ignite an inter-Jewish civil war, Katz said "we don't need a civil war to prevent Rabin from making mistakes." Rabin won't be able to remove the 150,000 Jews who reside in the territories and he can't abandon them, he said. And as for the Palestinians? There are minorities all over the world which do not exercise rights of sovereignty, he said.

* * *

The Dec. 14 twinning agreement with Beit El is "a sign of solidarity with the residents of Yesha and the Golan," said Larry Zeifman, BAYT's chairman of the board.

The communities are similar in many ways, including size, youthfulness and religious approach, and BAYT's congregation is very sympathetic to the situation facing the residents of Beit El, he said. While so far BAYT is offering strictly moral support, there is room for more tangible manifestations of that support, he said.

Under consideration are a pen pal program which will see children writing to each other in Hebrew; visits to Beit El of BAYT members' children who are studying or visiting in Israel; and a possible synagogue trip to Israel, part of which will be spent in Beit El.

Asked whether the twinning arrangement stirred any controversy in the synagogue, Zeifman said "the support of the board was overwhelming and so far the support of the members has been overwhelming."

BEIT EL DATA:

- The settlement was established in 1977 by seven families; today it is home to 650 families with about 3,500 people.
- Beit El is located in the West Bank, between Ramallah and Nablus.
- The original settlers "were motivated by our right to come and to settle in the old places [where] our forefathers and kings used to live," Katz said.
- Most settlers in Beit El come out of the Bnai Akiva, religious Zionist, movement, Katz said.
- Katz, one of the settlement's founders, is also one of the founders of the Gush Emunim movement.

BBW/C's big on loonies for fundraising campaign

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An innovative year-long fundraising campaign geared to tough economic times will wind up at the end of March, when B'nai Brith Women of Canada (BBW/C) members send in their final batches of loonies. The money has been collected for the organization's Children's Home in Israel on the occasion of its 50th anniversary.

For the campaign, entitled Share Your Love...Sharing Your Loonies, members received empty film canisters to be filled with loonies. Because of the recession, it was felt that collecting one-dollar coins would be "less painful than writing a cheque," said Penny Krowitz, BBW/C executive director.

As of early January, the campaign had brought in three-quarters of its goal, Krowitz said.

"We've had people who have filled eight canisters," Krowitz told The CJN. "Some women keep it in their purse or desk. Others keep it where their husbands empty their pockets at night."

One member requested that her family bring loonies instead of flowers or candies when they came to her house for Chanukah, Krowitz said. Together they contributed $350.

Benefits Children's Home

The Children's Home, established in Jerusalem to help children orphaned by the Holocaust, has grown to a three-campus residential treatment centre for emotionally troubled boys.

The Children's Home is for boys between the ages of 8 and 14. Over 60 per cent of its residents go on to successfully lead independent lives, according to a BBW/C news release. The BBW Canada Group House for 14 to 18-year-olds and the Margit Levy Apartment for Group House graduates are also part of the facility.

Constant care and a loving, supportive environment are the main tools used by the staff to help the children develop intellectually and emotionally.

B'nai Brith Women owns and operates the facility and provides half its operating budget.

Rae helps open doors to Mideast business

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Surrounded as he was by blue-chip Ontario business leaders, looking sombre and stern in their dark suits, the casual observer may have been forgiven for thinking Premier Bob Rae was about to experience another upbraiding for his economic policies here at home.

Instead, the province's first socialist leader was praised to the hilt by members of the business mission he led recently to Israel and Jordan.

Rae, who took over a dozen Ontario businesspeople to the Mideast to cash in on the opportunities peace in the region is hoped to present, "opened doors that otherwise would not have been opened for us," lauded Toronto architect Jack Diamond at a Queen's Park press conference last week. "He's an extremely good salesman."

Pat Palmer, president of the Ontario Chamber of Commerce — not exactly a big Rae booster in the past — called the premier "our mascot," and said the trip generated headlines in Hebrew, Arabic and English newspapers throughout the area.

Although reluctant to place a total value on what was concluded during the 10-day mission, Rae told reporters that contracts signed between Ontario and Israeli businesses amount to "tens of millions of dollars."

As well, he said, the mission laid the groundwork for future mega-projects, such as a giant electric grid linking the entire region, transportation systems and new infrastructure investments to bring about the "reconstruction" of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The trip's showcase was the signing of a research and marketing agreement between Newbridge Networks of Kanata, Ont. and Tadiran Communications, Israel's leading telecommunications firm.

The agreement allows the companies to integrate Tadiran products into Newbridge systems, and vice-versa.

Although outside this trip, Rae was on hand in Jerusalem for the signing of a deal between Israel Aircraft Industries and Pratt & Whitney Canada, in which Israel will buy Canadian turbo engines, each costing over $1 million, for a series of new corporate jets.

Following a meeting with Micha Harish, Israel's industry and trade minister, Ontario also struck a deal to create direct channels for the exchange of information on business opportunities in Israel and to locate potential partners for high-tech and turnkey projects in Ontario, Israel and third countries.

There will also be a seminar for Israeli business leaders on doing business in Ontario.

Rae said Ontario invited delegations from the Middle East to visit the province in the coming months to continue talks on telecommunications, health care and potential water and sewage projects.

The bottom line for Rae is that Israel and Canada need a free trade agreement, and he said he's optimistic one will be signed. "I see no reason a Middle East at peace would not be as important an area for growth as Asia clearly now is," the premier remarked. "It's not a matter of ideology, but sheer common sense."

The premier also announced he has suggested that PLO chairman Yasser Arafat spend "at least a day or two" in Ontario during his forthcoming visit to Canada.

Jacques Gauthier, a Toronto lawyer who was on the trip, said Ontario and Israel agreed to build a theatre in Jerusalem that will show Imax films, and struck a coproduction deal to shoot an Imax movie using the Canadian technology. Both are scheduled to be ready by 1996 to coincide with celebrations marking Jerusalem's 3,000th anniversary.

The deals are estimated at between $10 million and $15 million, Gauthier said.

On a personal note, Rae said one of the trip's highlights was when he went to a child care centre in Israel where children sang, in Hebrew and Arabic, a song written by the premier called We're in the Same Boat Now.

"It was a marvelous moment which I will never, ever forget," he said.

Rae told The CJN he and his wife, Arlene Perly Rae, went to the Nachum Goldmann Museum of the Diaspora and researched the Lithuanian town of Zidikai, where Perly Rae's mother and grandmother were born.

Zundel TV show pulled off the air in Texas town

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With his trademark construction hardhat, his contemptuous vilification of Jews and his two trials for distributing a booklet that denied the Holocaust, Ernst Zundel has become a nationally-recognized symbol of anti-Semitism and neo-Nazism.

While many Canadians have become fully aware of his message of Holocaust-denial and of the jury decisions that rejected it, Zundel in recent months appears to have taken his message to the United States in the hope of finding fertile ground.

It appears his message may be having some impact. A few weeks ago in El Paso, Texas, Jewish school administrator Marc Kramer was taken aback when his neighbor accused him of telling lies about the Holocaust. The neighbor, a middle-aged man of Hispanic descent, had "just seen a 'news program' on television that said the Holocaust had never taken place and that it was a propaganda creation of the world Jewish community," Kramer said in a telephone interview.

"The fact that it was on TV was enough for him to believe it," Kramer said. "Only after a great deal of discussion and arguing was I able to explain to him this curse of revisionism and that what he had seen was neo-Nazi propaganda."

Kramer, the 23-year-old director of the El Paso Hebrew Day School, joined Rabbi Stephen Leon of Congregation B'nai Zion, Sol Littman of the Canadian office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC) and representatives of the local Roman Catholic, Episcopal and Protestant churches to meet with the management and owners of KJLF television station to discuss their concerns about Zundel's show, the Voice of Freedom. The program was being aired once a week on Sunday at 4 p.m., reaching as many as one million homes. It contained items that suggested that Auschwitz was more of a recreation centre than a death camp, Kramer said.

The Voice of Freedom was the same program that Zundel had succeeded in getting aired for a short time on satellite broadcasters Showcase America and Keystone Communications. Both stations pulled the show after they were given information about Zundel and his neo-Nazi affiliations.

In El Paso, after negotiations that Kramer described as sometimes "emotional, with voices raised and accusations made," the station agreed to terminate broadcast of the shows as soon as the contract would allow. Altogether, seven episodes will have run when the agreement runs out, Kramer said, a far cry from the 52 that the station had the option of carrying.

Very few people in El Paso, including the station managers, had heard about Zundel before the controversy over the show erupted, Kramer said. But once it did, it became a front page story in the community of 750,000, being treated at first as a freedom of speech issue.

Littman said the Wiesenthal Centre "welcomed the opportunity to explain to station KJLF that the controversy surrounding the Voice of Freedom programs was not a matter of First Amendment rights, but of a community's commitment to truth and history."

He said the remaining shows will be preceded by a disclaimer saying the station did not agree with its contents and that the Holocaust did in fact take place. The station has also accepted an offer to air in the near future the SWC's documentary, Genocide.

Kramer said the involvement of Christian leaders in the meeetings with the station representatives was "essential" in leading to the reversal of the decision to air the shows. Their views carried weight with the station owners, who are "religious Christians," he said. Furthermore, "it did not appear they were being strong-armed by the Jewish community."

And as for his neighbor, Kramer said he has continued to watch the program but he no longer believes he lied to him. In fact, he now says he "can't believe the lies that are presented on the show."

Jeweller's alleged killer faces manslaughter charge

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO– A special unit of Austrian police used a stun grenade and commando-like tactics when they rushed into an apartment at 1:40 in the morning to arrest manslaughter suspect Alex Yaari, an Ontario criminal court was told last week.

A native of Russia, Yaari is charged with manslaughter in connection with the death on July 9, 1991 of jeweller Michael Kleinberg, as well as the robbery of diamonds and jewelry from Samuel Kleinberg Jewellery, located in Lawrence Plaza on Toronto's Bathurst Street strip.

searched Yaari's jacket and found 30 rings in a transparent plastic bag in an inside pocket.

"Three other possible gold rings lying on a table" were also seized, Hess said.

Hess was one of several Austrian police officers who testified last week at Yaari's trial. He told the eight-man, four-woman jury that they received information that Yaari, who also faced Austrian charges for robbery, was in the apartment of Serge Brodkin.

Brodkin, a Russian who lives in Vienna, earlier testified that he had helped Yaari sell some gems to a Viennese jeweller. Speaking through a Russian-language interpreter, Brodkin said that later, on Dec. 5, 1991, he was severely assaulted by Yaari.

Werner Windich, an officer of the security police department of Lower Austria, said he saw Brodkin in hospital afterwards and "his head was in plaster" with openings only around the nose and eyes.

The trial continues.

Rings found

Police used an "irritation device" that resulted in a loud bang and created a brilliant flash of light, Austrian police officer Josef Hess told court. Shortly after entering the apartment about 30 seconds later, Hess said he

Neo-Nazi gets jail for assault with chain

OTTAWA — An Ottawa neo-Nazi has been sentenced to 45 days in jail and three years probation for his part in a brawl in which he struck an anti-racist activist repeatedly with a chain.

Twenty-four-year-old Daniel Roussel was part of a group of neo-Nazis who fought with police and anti-racists after a skinhead rock concert last May.

The attack was captured on videotape and broadcast on an Ottawa television station.

As Roussel was led away to jail, two skinheads in the court gave the Nazi salute.

Roussel had pleaded guilty to assault causing bodily harm. The victim of the attack suffered cuts and bruises.

Ariel Sharon

In a land of passionate politics, few figures in Israel arouse as much passion as warrior-statesman Ariel Sharon. Known for his hard-line views, Sharon now stands at the forefront of a worldwide campaign to rally Jews against the September peace accord signed with the PLO, which he feels spells mortal danger for the Jewish state and Jews everywhere, and an equally forceful drive to raise cash for embattled Jewish settlers in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

Born in 1928 in the farming village of Kfar Malal, near Tel Aviv, Sharon joined the pre-state Hagana at the age of 14. Rising steadily through the military ranks after independence, Sharon attained the rank of general and is a veteran of every campaign in modern Israel's history.

Elected to the Knesset just after the 1973 war, in which he had led troops to within 100 km of Cairo, Sharon soon resigned to act as Commander of Sinai, But he returned to politics in the late 1970s and joined Likud.

As Minister of Defence in 1982, Sharon led Israel's invasion of Lebanon. He was dismissed from the post after an Israeli commission of inquiry did not completely absolve Israel of blame for the massacre of 460 Arabs at the Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps in Beirut.

But Sharon bounced back to become Minister of Housing from 1990 to 1992, during which period he aggressively expanded Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

Sharon again made headlines earlier this month when he declared publicly that he intends to seek the Likud leadership and the prime minister's job, primarly because he feels leader Benjamin Netanyahu has failed to arouse opposition to the peace accord.

Sharon launched a 10-city, 10-day North American blitz last week in Toronto, where he inveighed against the accord in front of a synagogue audience of 2,000 and called for donations to settlers. His visit was sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Yesha, the council that represents Jewish settlers in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

He was interviewed by The CJN*'s Ron Csillag.*

CJN: What do you think Israel faces in the short- and long-terms?

Sharon: In the short term we can expect an increase in terror by the various terrorist organizations. The main assumption of the government by signing the Declaration of Principles with one terrorist organization — one Palestinian terrorist organization out of 15 — [was] that this terrorist organization would act against the others. Israel signed the Declaration of Principles with the PLO. Within the PLO, the Fatah group, commanded directly by Yasser Arafat, accepted it, but even they are participating in terror. Meanwhile, there is an agreement between the Hamas terrorist organization and the Fatah terrorist organization not to fight each other and that Hamas is going to participate in the Palestinian establishment.

All our intelligence agencies have been warning in recent weeks that there will be an increase in terror and that Arafat himself — a war criminal according to every criteria — though he might prefer quiet in Gaza and Jericho, would like terror to increase in other places or within Israel's pre-1967 boundaries. And that is the result of his understanding that Jewish communities in Israel are very sensitive to casualties and once more casualties are inflicted on the Jewish population, the pressure by the population on the government to make further concessions will become greater, and the government would make further concessions.

As a matter of fact, we hear from time to time the term compromise. Since the beginning of negotiations with the PLO terrorist organization, Arafat has not made the slightest concession. In their eyes, compromise is when the PLO accepts Israeli concessions.

So in the short term, I see a deterioration in security and many casualties and bloodshed.

In further develoments, it's hard to see. In the next election, [scheduled for 1996 at the latest], this issue of a peace agreement will be the major issue. If Labor is re-elected, it means people do support this line. But if a Likud government is elected, it will mean the majority of Jews in the country do not support the agreement with the PLO terrorist organization. I think what will happen is a newly-elected government will have to act according to the wish and will of the people. That's exctly the meaning of democracy.

I think it's a mistake to look at the problems of the Middle East as [those] between Palestinians and Jews. That is one of the problems, but not the most important one. There are several basic problems in the Middle East. One is the basic hatred of the Arab world toward Jews and Israel. We do not see even the slightest change in Arab attitudes [on this]. We don't even see the slightest wish or desire for conciliation with the state of Israel. That's the most dangerous thing.

Next year, it will be 15 years since we signed the [Camp David] agreement with Egypt. Take a look at the cartoons in their newspapers. The Nazi [newspaper] Der Sturmer could have learned from them; how they describe Israel and Israeli leaders — not only Begin and Shamir in the past, but Rabin and this leftist government now.

Then of course, the second problem is the arms race in the Middle East. Arabs are building tremendous military strength. The suppliers are the United States, Europe, the various former communist countries, the former Soviet Union, China, North Korea. We speak about conventional and non-conventional weapons. Who would have thought that a small country like Syria would have 5,000 tanks? They just now purchased 1,000 modern tanks. Syria has more than 1,000 surface-to-surface missiles, half of which are short range — up to 80 kilometres. The rest are Scud-B and Scud-C, with ranges of 300 and 500 kilometres [respectively]. And that's only Syria. Egypt is building the largest, most modern air force in the Middle East. And they also have 1,000 tanks. That's a very dangerous situation.

CJN: Are they preparing for war?

Sharon: (Pauses). I don't think it's important [whether] they are preparing for war, because words and even intentions are unimportant. What is important is their capabilities. What they might do is what's really important. I personally believe the peace negotiations should have been used as a lever to stop the arms race.

The third problem is more complicated: how to equalize military strength between Israel and its Arab neighbors.

Then we have the problem of Palestinian terror. This terror started more than 120 years ago. My grandfather faced this terror, my parents [did] all their lives, myself, my sons, who are two young reserve officers, faced this problem. I know families that have faced this problem for five, six generations. It's not only the number of casualties we suffer; Palestinian terror has been the cause of most of the wars in the Middle East in the past 45 years.

And then we have another major problem in the Middle East: Palestinian refugees of the war in 1948. When they left, they were close to 1 million. At the same time, Israel absorbed 1 million Jews from Arab countries and despite the difficulties, they were all integrated. The Arabs never wanted to integrate or solve the problem of refugees because it was a tool in the struggle against Israel. This problem should be solved within the Arab countries.

Arafat is saying — and it's the only thing we can trust [him about] — that he will establish a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital and will bring in hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of Palestinian refugees. That would create only tension, bloodshed and war.

Even if we sign agreements with more Arab countries, I'm afraid as a result of the terror we would face and the counter-measures we would have to take, it would bring tension between Israel and Arab countries. We would have to react; they would not be able to sit and watch. Altogether, it was a mistake to go along these lines. A major mistake.

CJN: Do you see anything positive in the Sept. 13 accord?

Sharon: Nothing. (Pauses). Just nothing. From a moral point of view, Israel signed an agreement with a man who, according to any criteria, is a war criminal. I don't know of any other man since the Nazis who has so much civilian Jewish blood on his hands [than Arafat]. It will be very hard in the future for Jews to fight anti-Semitism and to take steps against war criminals because people will say, "Look, your own government signed an agreement with a war criminal."

From a practical point of view, we did not sign this Declaration of Principles with the Palestinian people; we signed with one terrorist organization. And then they'll say that by accepting this idea that areas in the land of Israel are Judenrein (cleansed of Jews), and by agreeing with Arafat, Jews will not be able to live in Hebron, Shiloh or Beit El. Altogether, the day might come when anti-Semites in Brooklyn or Toronto will say, "Jews cannot live here." And Jews will say, "But we have a constitution." In our own country, a Jewish government and Jewish prime minister have decided that Jews cannot live in certain places.

So when the Yesha people struggle, the struggle is not only to defend the boundaries of Israel — and they are the last barriers we have against withdrawal to the pre-'67 boundaries — but I think it's a struggle of all Jews around the world once they decide to stand on their right to live wherever they want to live. I don't see anything good in this agreement.

CJN: Does Likud have an alternative to the peace plan?

Sharon: Look, in the Likud there were two approaches from the beginning. One I represented and the other was represented by others. I always said the only existing Palestinian state is Jordan, and we have to negotiate only with this exisiting Palestinian state. I was against [Palestinian] autonomy from the beginning [because] I said that sooner or later, it would lead to a second Palestinian state. As a matter of fact, I stayed in the minority [on this view]. Then came the autonomy plan, though Mr. Begin never saw that would lead to what's happened. Even Mr. Shamir never thought the day would come [when] he would see the establishment of a Palestinian state. And this autonomy, which is entirely different than the autonomy the Likud spoke of, will lead to a second Palestinian state.

In new elections, I believe the process will be stopped and there will be a different line. If a new [Likud] government accepts my point of view that negotiations should be with Jordan, then there will be one line. If a new Likud government decides to continue with the autonomy concept, to avoid establishment of a second Palestinian state, they would have to take one major decision: that autonomy would not include the entire area [now under the accord's term] and would not include areas or zones now inhabited by Jews [or] which are settled on strategically important terrain. Certain security areas would not be under autonomy and, let's say, a certain number of strategic roads which connect the coastal plane to the Jordan River, and which are used by a major part of the Jewish population, would be out of an autonomy plan. So you can, at least, partly avoid the danger of a second Palestinian state.

CJN: A few weeks ago, right here in Toronto, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu said he would honor the deal if he formed a government, but not "unilaterally." A few days ago, he said he would not the honor the deal at all. There seems to be some confusion within Likud.

Sharon: It's not in the Likud. I think he [Netanyahu] has confusions. One cannot carry on the policies of a major opposition party according to daily polls; it would be a lie. So I think that [Netanyahu's statements] caused a lot of damage, the fact that one day, he thinks one way and the other day, another way. One day, it's no withdrawal from the Golan Heights, the next day, it's a withdrawal of centimetres. All that does, of course, does increase doubt. But these are things we'll have to overcome.

CJN: Will you challenge Mr. Netanyahu for the Likud leadership?

Sharon: If I believe it will be in Israel's interest, I'll do it. It depends very much on what will happen ... on whether Likud will be able to overcome its difficulties. If Likud is not able to overcome its difficulties, it will be a different situation. It's not a personal issue. I did not participate in the primaries [for Likud leader] a year-and-a-half ago. But facing the present dangers, maybe I'll decide to do it. In any case, I've made my intentions clear.

CJN: Why do you think the government insists on moving ahead with the peace plan's implementation so quickly?

Sharon: They're trying to correct some of their major mistakes. It's unbelievable. A lawyer — a beginner — would not have these mistakes. It was carelessness, lack of national responsibility. [Negotiators] did not have the experience. They did not know the area, the terrain. They didn't know the "small" things. There are 82,000 Jewish children in Samaria and Judea. Small things, the security of children! Or how women will be able to drive to work or walk at night or whether a PLO man dressed as a policeman will be able to stop a Jewish car, when people don't if he's a terrorist.

Negotiators were speaking to these terrorists in Oslo for months [but] never bothered themselves to see the area they were speaking about! So they have problems now. In my opinion, all that should not have been.

Still work to do on Israel/PLO deal

JERUSALEM (JPFS) — Israel and PLO delegates last week began the painstaking task of comparing their separate drafts for an accord on withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and Jericho.

Israel also quietly acknowledged that last month's talks in Cairo did not include a Palestinian commitment.

Israel had initially tried to press the PLO to draft an agreement based on what Jerusalem said were understandings reached in Cairo by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and the PLO's Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen).

Nonetheless, one Israeli source said that "from our point of view, the disputes have been resolved. We now just have to agree on how to phrase this in a formal agreement."

The PLO has rejected this approach. The delegation denies any commitment to an agreement on such issues, as control of border crossings, the size of Jericho and security arrangements in Gaza. Instead, PLO delegates have tried to portray Israel as negotiating in bad faith.

The two delegations established a committee to review the drafts and define areas of agreement, but delegates dismissed reports of progress on resolving their major points of dispute.

"The situation is not simple," said Israeli delegation spokesman Ami Gluska. "We have not concluded anything."

"We have been discussing principles, not details," said Mohammed Dahlan of the PLO delegation.

The Israeli delegation waited more than a day for a PLO response to its latest proposals, which include a map of the Jericho self-rule enclave.

Unlike during the earlier talks at Taba, officials have not tried to portray the negotiations as harmonious.

PLO delegation chairman Nabil Sha'ath reiterated that the talks could be completed within three weeks and suggested that Israel would be blamed for failure to meet his deadline.

"I cannot predict whether the Israeli party is ready to do this," Sha'ath said. "Many statements from the Israeli party have shown that they are not ready to finish in three weeks."

Sha'ath sounded much more positive than the Israelis, reporting "excellent, very rapid" progress on issues related to handover of civilian aspects of government in the autonomous zones.

Sha'ath was also intent on proving his claims that the talks in Cairo did not constitute an agreement. He has been angered by the insistence of some of the Israeli delegates not to discuss substantial change on the issues the Israelis claim were agreed to in Cairo.

A senior Israeli source confirmed that the Cairo talks did not constitute a clear commitment.

"The papers [drafted in Cairo] dealt with some of the issues and they were called understandings," he said. "There was no agreement, nothing signed. But we can't dismiss the understandings."

Israeli government decisions null and void, rabbi asserts

JERUSALEM (JPFS) — Israel's former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Shlomo Goren said last Sunday that observant Jews should "certainly not heed" laws passed by the Knesset if the laws were not passed by a majority of Jewish MKs.

Rabbi Goren's comments came during an interview in which he was explaining the significance of his most recent halachic opinion, to be published in about three weeks by the Rabbinical Forum in Judea, Samaria and Gaza.

In this opinion, Rabbi Goren rules that according to Halacha, the Rabin government's decisions are null and void because the government is dependent on the votes of Arab MKs.

Although Rabbi Goren has said similar things in the past, this is the first time he has cited rabbinic sources to support this view, including citations from such halachic sources as Maimonides and Nachmanides.

Furthermore, in this newest opinion, Rabbi Goren says any law passed by the Knesset on the strength of Arab MKs — not just those that deal with the peace process or the settlements — is null and void.

Rabbi Eliezer Melamed, the head of the rabbinical forum, said this opinion is more "far-reaching" than Rabbi Goren's previous one on soldiers disobeying orders to uproot Jewish settlements.

After he made that ruling last month, there were calls to to indict him for sedition, but no charges were filed (see News in Brief).

Rabbi Shlomo Goren

Murder trial delayed

JERUSALEM (JPFS) — Jerusalem District Court last Sunday postponed for three weeks the trial of the accused killers of Jason (Yehoshua) Friedberg, the Montreal native murdered by Arab terrorists last March, and of three others, after parents of two of the victims physically attacked and injured the defendants in court.

Jawad, Mohammed and Ibrahim Shamansa are charged with killing Friedberg as well as Lior Tubul, Ronen Karamani and Rafi Doron.

When the accused were led into the courtroom, the parents of Tubul and Karamani yelled out "Murderers! You murdered our children!" and began beating them.

A melee ensued in which two of the accused suffered light head injuries and several policemen suffered scratches.

Police had difficulty restoring order and it was nearly half an hour before the hearing could continue.

The defendants are accused of murdering hitchhiking teenagers Tubul and Karamani in Jerusalem's Ramot neighborhood in August, 1990; of murdering taxi driver Doron in October 1990; and of killing ex-Montrealer Friedberg, a member of the elite Golani brigade whose body was discovered last spring on the road between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

Summit regenerates Syrian peace process

By ALON PINKAS
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM (JPFS) — If Israel expected an unequivocal statement from Syrian President Hafez al-Assad elaborating on the essence of peace, it did not get one. But if the Israeli-Syrian peace process was stalemated, the Clinton-Assad summit regenerated it.

On previous occasions, Assad repeatedly expressed Syria's willingness to establish "full peace" in exchange for full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights. That implied that the Israeli-Egyptian precedent should be applied. But Assad never provided the Anwar Sadat sense for drama, nor emulated Sadat's Jerusalem trip, crucial to overcoming psychological suspicions and real security considerations.

This is partly attributable to Assad's political style. But it also has to do with an underlying trend of contemporary Syrian policy — that the Golan Heights is not Assad's top priority. His priorities are improving relations with the United States, which would generate foreign investments into an ailing Syrian economy depleted by low oil prices; removal from the U.S. list of terror sponsors; and maintaining control of Lebanon, the last remnant of "Greater Syria."

If achieving these goals requires a flexible approach to the peace process, Assad will play along. Thus, he is interested in the by-products of the peace process rather than a piece of real estate. Assad does not want to be remembered as the leader who irretrievably lost the Golan, but even more, he fears losing hegemonic aspirations in the Arab world.

Parity with Israel, Assad realized, is no longer viable after the disintegration of the Soviet Union. The superpower umbrella has ceased to exist. Peace has become Syria's strategic priority, peace with the world's only existing global power, the United States.

Assad, an astute observer of world and regional politics, applied his strategy in the Gulf War, when he dispatched units to the U.S.-led allied force. Assad does not think that war with Israel is viable or prudent, but he believes in a regional military balance.

At the summit, Assad gained the Americans' full understanding that Syria remains the key to a comprehensive settlement. More importantly, he reverted the process to Kissinger-style shuttle diplomacy which will commence shortly. He gained the respect of the United States, and at the same time put Israel in a predicament.

Jerusalem shopping centre caters to Orthodox clientele

JERUSALEM (JTA) — There is a boutique near the central bus station here, the Jeans Club, that is doing a flourishing business these days after floundering for the past couple of years.

But anyone searching for a pair of jeans had better look elsewhere, because for the past year the Jeans Club has not sold a single pair of pants.

In fact, there is not a pair of jeans for sale in the entire shopping centre where the store is located.

Long-sleeved blouses have replaced tank tops. Long, modest skirts have displaced minis.

Since last January, the entire Center 1 Mall, a hub of 40 shops, has devoted itself solely to a fervently religious clientele. And business has never been better.

"The vast majority of women who shop here now are religious, so we cater to them," says store manager Irit Harnoy matter-of-factly.

Built by the Yona hotel chain in 1987, Center 1 was originally designed to attract a wide range of customers, religious and secular, Jewish and Arab, in this busy section of the city, says Avi Ben-Arush, the shopping mall's manager.

"It did for a while," says Ben-Arush. "But then business slowed down."

"Part of the problem was the intifada," says the mall's sole Arab storekeeper, who runs a large souvenir shop. "The centre has always relied heavily on tourists, and the intifada has hurt the tourist industry.

"We also used to have a lot of wealthy Arabs from, say, Bethlehem, who would come to the mall and spend a lot of money," he says.

"Those days have been over for a long time," the shopowner says.

"We knew we needed to find a niche in the market, something special," recalls Ben-Arush. "The centre sits between a number of very religious neighborhoods, so it seemed like a natural choice."

Once the decision to change was made, management had to figure out exactly how to go about it, he says.

"We wanted the mall to have a certain atmosphere so that religious shoppers would feel comfortable here," he says. "On the other hand, we did not want to drive away secular customers.

"Finding the balance hasn't always been easy," he concedes.

Three women's sportswear stores that would have had no future vacated the premises, as did a cosmetics salon.

Then all the centre's eateries underwent the strictest possible kashrut conversion.

Now, a quadruplex movie theater, one of the newest in Jerusalem, is about to be transformed into a wedding hall that will cater to the Orthodox community.

While the manager maintains that "no one was forced out, we did have to make a deal" with some storeowners before they would leave, he says.

Jerusalem City Councilman Ornan Yekutieli, a former deputy mayor and a proponent of the rights of the capital's secular residents, has less sanguine recollections.

"When the process started, many of the shopowners were forced to leave. In one case, the owner of a women's clothing and lingerie shop arrived at the mall and found her store's window covered with newspapers," he recalls.

"There was also pressure on people who didn't play the right kind of music," he says.

The music "used to be David Bowie. Now there's a lot of classical music and show tunes," says Efrat Cohen, a young, jeans-clad waitress at the Ne'eman Cafe.

But the change does not bother her, she says. "I really like the religious community. They're good customers. If the food is good, they say so."

Not everyone shopping at the mall is observant.

"It's convenient for me to come here" for a bite to eat, says a soldier at the Ne'eman Cafe. But, she says, she does her shopping elsewhere.

Christians, Jews talk in Germany

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Christians must "clean up" their skewed view of Judaism, says a Protestant theologian from Germany who's deeply involved in German-Jewish dialogue forums.

Distortions and canards about Judaism remain systemic despite efforts by such groups to dispel them, declared Paul-Gerhard Aring.

All too often, he said in an interview, "Christian piety" rests on a foundation of anti-Jewish prejudice.

Negative references to Judaism abound in the New Testament, and some Christians still believe that Jews crucified Jesus, added Aring, the former director of the Melanchton Academy, an adult education institute in Cologne.

Christian-Jewish dialogue groups in Germany have created a climate of trust and co-operation between Germans and Jews, he said.

And since 1950, nearly 2,000 books about Jews and Judaism have been published in Germany.

Nevertheless, Aring warned, there is still a "terrible ignorance" about Jews and Judaism among Germans.

Aring, who currently teaches biblical Hebrew and Judaic studies at Klaipeda University in Lithuania, said there are simply not enough Jewish scholars and teachers in Germany today to carry on a dialogue with Germans.

"We need the help and co-operation of Jews."

Suggesting that Christians should seek a "new relationship" with Jews based on mutual respect, Aring noted that the recent decision by Israel and the Vatican to establish diplomatic relations represents one step toward better Christian-Jewish ties.

Aring, 67, made his remarks following a luncheon at the home of Roland Fournes, Germany's consul-general in Toronto.

Later, Aring delivered a lecture at Adath Israel Congregation. Its former spiritual leader, Cologne-born Rabbi Erwin Schild, is friends with Aring, whom he met during a study trip to Germany some years ago.

Aring and his wife, Ursula, are translating Rabbi Schild's book, World Through My Window, a collection of sermons, into German.

According to Rabbi Schild, Aring believes, firstly, that Christians are theologically obliged to maintain contact with Jews, and, secondly, that Christians cannot really understand their faith unless they engage in dialogue with "Jesus and his Jews."

Aring is associated with the Society for Christian-Jewish Co-operation, based in Frankfurt.

He is also a member of the German-Israel Society, and has visited Israel 10 times.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

GASNER

Leon Gasner of Toronto reports that research into the family name discloses a bit of family history from Spain, Holland and Poland. While this migratory pattern is a familiar one, the surname does not appear to be of Spanish, Dutch or Polish origin. It appears rather to emanate from the German or Yiddish hausner (house owner). The aspirate 'h' yields to the hard 'g' in the Slavic alphabet like Halpern to Galpern.

OK BLUE JAYS

When Shirley Levene of Kitchener, Ont., visited Israel recently, she brought along a special memento: a pennant of the Toronto Blue Jays. While visiting Canada Centre in Metulla, on Israel's northern border, she had the opportunity to present it to the local people. Canada Centre is the recreation centre built by the UIA of Canada. From left: Clary Lishansky, assistant to Metulla Mayor Yossi Goldberg, Carol Hasdai, secretary of Canada Centre, and Shirley Levene. [Reuven Rosenfelder photo]

IN 1967, CANADIAN JEWS GAVE $27 MILLION TO SUPPORT A COUNTRY AT WAR. HOW MUCH WILL WE GIVE TO SUPPORT PEACE?

During war, no one questions the urgent need for money to support Israel. And Canadian Jews have always responded quickly and generously. But today, at this historic juncture in the peace process, the need for money to ensure the enduring security of Israel is just as critical. For 14 years the New Israel Fund has been building a strategic weapon for peace. It's called "Democracy." And we need your help to strengthen it. Because without a strong democracy in Israel and the territories, peace will not work. Without freedom, without equality, without co-existence, peace will not work.

Since 1979, we have raised more than $50 million to support freedom, equality and justice for all people within the borders of Israel—Arab as well as Jew. In 1994, we need to raise $10 million more. Winning a peace, just like winning a war, is expensive. And responding quickly and generously is essential. But if we succeed, you will never have to answer another appeal to support Israel at war again.

Former Bonds CEO Rosenne sought for financial advice

NEW YORK (JTA) — After raising more than $1 billion (U.S.) for Israel for the third year in a row, it shouldn't be a surprise that representatives of foreign governments have asked Meir Rosenne for advice.

Rosenne, who is returning to Israel this month after five years as chief executive officer of State of Israel Bonds, said the president of the Ukraine wanted help in setting up an effort to raise capital from the Ukrainian diaspora.

Other approaches have come from Hungary and Poland, Rosenne said in an interview.

In 1993, Israel Bonds sold $1.068 billion (U.S.) worth of bonds, half in the United States and another 10 percent in Canada. This compares with $753 million in 1989, the first year Rosenne, a former ambassador to Washington, held the post.

In the past five years, Rosenne has kept the organization's expenses to $41 million, in part by closing 15 offices in the United States and laying off more than 200 people around the world.

Rosenne attributed sales growth to the desire of world Jewry to help Israel finance the needs of the half-million Jews from the former Soviet Union who have already arrived in Israel, and the hundreds of thousands more who are expected to come.

Under his direction, Israel Bonds issued new notes that appealed to American investors because of their relatively high rates at a time when general interest rates were plunging to lowest level in decades.

One consequence was that some in Jerusalem began to ask about the value of the bonds and their cost, particularly as American loan guarantees made available up to $10 billion in low-cost capital.

Rosenne retorted that as helpful as the loan guarantees are, there is a political risk to them.

He noted that the United States has indicated that it will withhold more than $437 million from the $2 billion in guarantees scheduled for this year, to reflect Israeli spending in the territories.

Still, the Israeli Finance Ministry, which determines what bonds are available for the organization to sell, was not willing to pay too high a price to break 1992's record sales of $1.167 billion. This year the bonds organization was asked to sell only $1 billion worth.

Rosenne also noted that the 2,500 fund-raising functions the bonds organization sponsors each year in 26 countries serve a purpose in their own right, bringing Jews together "to hear reports about what is going on in Israel."

This side of State of Israel Bonds was highlighted in a recent Knesset debate, when it was discovered that Knesset Member Gideon Patt had not been seen in the country for six weeks. It turned out that he had been speaking first for the Jewish National Fund in Australia, and later for Israel Bonds.

"These trips by Knesset members are not vacation tours, not at all," said Rosenne. "They work quite hard."

He said some Knesset members refuse to speak, complaining that they "have absolutely no time to visit the museum or do anything else."

Speakers for Israel Bonds receive airfare and hotel accommodations, but not fees. In the United States, said Rosenne, government officials and other prominent speakers can easily earn $50,000 for one speech.

SHAMIR PROTESTS

Norwegian peace negotiator Holst was go-between for Israel-PLO deal

OSLO (JTA) — Norwegian Foreign Minister Johan Holst, 56, a chief architect of the secret negotiations in Oslo that led to the Israeli-Palestinian accord, died last Thursday in a Norwegian hospital.

The statesman had suffered a stroke Dec. 16. Doctors said he had been suffering from exhaustion and probably died of a second stroke.

Holst was responsible for organizing at least 13 rounds of the so-called back-channel talks between Israel and the PLO during which the longtime arch-enemies hammered out a mutual recognition pact and self-rule accord.

After the clandestine talks were concluded in the Norwegian capital, Holst confessed that he had hardly slept during the weeks the negotiations took place.

Because of his strenuous efforts in the peace process, Holst was nominated last week for the 1994 Nobel Peace Prize.

Holst's death elicited expressions of great sadness by both Israel and the PLO.

In Jerusalem, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres praised Holst as the man who made the accord possible.

"Minister Holst was a statesman with a true commitment and dedication to peace who relentlessly worked to promote the political process in the Middle East with wisdom, dignity and untiring devotion," Peres said.

Johan Holst

"The people of Israel share with the people of Norway the great sense of grief and bereavement over the loss of a man who symbolized for so many the banner of peace and hope. We will continue to work unceasingly to fulfill his legacy," he added.

"This is a big loss," said PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat in a message from Tunis. "We lost with his early departure one of the sincerest friends of the Palestinian people."

PLO officials said they would name a main road and a square after Holst in the West Bank town of Jericho, which, along with the Gaza Strip, will attain Palestinian self-rule under terms of the accord he helped broker.

Holst's wife, Marianne Heiberg, a Middle East scholar, had also played a role in the secret negotiations. The two were often credited with providing a warm, easygoing atmosphere in which the Israeli and Palestinian teams could get to know one another personally before settling down to the more difficult task of working out an accord.

On Sept. 10, Holst personally delivered to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin a letter from Arafat in which the PLO chairman said the PLO "recognizes the right of Israel to exist in peace and security."

On that day, Rabin signed in Holst's presence a second letter saying the Jewish state regarded the PLO as "the representative of the Palestinian people."

The two letters formed the basis of the mutual recognition accord.

Holst, a former Norwegian defense minister, became foreign minister last April.

He was reportedly criticized for getting overly involved in details and for preferring behind-the scenes diplomacy.

Canadian diplomat meets PLO hardliners

OTTAWA — Canada's top Mideast diplomat will soon hold talks with his Israeli counterparts, after meeting last weekend with hardline Palestinian representatives.

Marc Perron, assistant deputy minister for Africa and the Middle East, is expected to meet in the coming weeks with Israel's deputy foreign minister, Yossi Beilin, and with Yossi Hadass, Israel's delegate to the multilateral negotiations on Mideast refugees, chaired by Canada.

In Damascus last Saturday, Perron held talks with George Habash, leader of the Popular Front for the Liberal of Palestine (PFLP), and with Nayaf Hawatmeh, head of the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine. Both leaders reject the Israel-PLO accord and reflect the most radical elements in the Palestinian world.

Diplomats said the talks, requested by Perron, were the first public contact between a Western representative and Palestinian rejectionists.

In the past few weeks, Perron has been laying the groundwork for the next session on the refugee working group, expected this spring.

Habash repeated his rejection of the Gaza-Jericho plan because "it does not respond to the minimum rights of the Palestinian people," a PFLP spokesperson said after the meeting.

Canada should pressure Israel to respond to United Nations resolutions on the Middle East, the spokesperson added.

Perron is scheduled to hold talks with leaders in the West Bank, Gaza and Egypt, said Foreign Affairs ministry spokesman Rodney Moore.

The News in Brief

No to Zhirinovsky: CJC

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress has written federal immigration minister Sergio Marchi requesting that any application to visit Canada by Russian ultra-nationalist leader Vladimir Zhirinovsky be denied. "Mr. Zhirinovsky's outrageous statements, racism and anti-Semitism would make his presence unacceptable to all Canadians," wrote CJC executive vice-president Alan Rose. In the past few weeks, Zhirinovsky has been expelled from Bulgaria and refused admission to Germany and Romania.

Aliyah From North America Up

NEW YORK — In 1993, 3,957 Jews from the United States and Canada immigrated to Israel, nearly a 40 percent increase over the 2,900 who made aliya in 1992, according to aliya officials. About half of those immigrants were from the greater New York area, 316 were from Los Angeles, 144 from Toronto, 86 from Montreal, 43 from Vancouver and the rest from other, largely urban areas. Yossi Kucik, director of the Israel Aliya Center for the World Zionist Organization in New York, noted that the 1993 figures come on top of a similar increase from 1991 to 1992. He said he believed the trend would continue. "We could quite easily see 10,000 people a year making aliya" from North America, he said.

Tourism to Israel Up Too

JERUSALEM — A record 1,652,000 tourists visited Israel in 1993, a nine per cent increase over the previous year, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics. Of these, about 1,376,400 came by air, with 19,300 arriving by sea, and another 256,500 by land. Another 290,400 visitors came on cruises, a drop of two per cent from 1992.

Rabbi Norman Frimer Dies

NEW YORK — Rabbi Norman Frimer, the Toronto-born administrator of the national Hillel campus organization system in the U.S., died here recently. He was 77. Rabbi Frimer was also a former director of the Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture and the Conference on Material Claims Against Germany. Although born in Toronto, he grew up in Chicago. Rabbi Frimer was a professor of rabbinics and Holocaust literature at Brooklyn College until 1975. At that campus, he also served as Hillel director from 1952 to 1967. At the same time, he served as the regional director of New York's 15 Hillel chapters and went on to become international Hillel director from 1976 to 1978.

'Copter Crash Kills Four

TEL AVIV — Israel was reeling last week after the death of the military officer in charge of the West Bank. Maj.-Gen. Nechemia Tamari, head of the Israel Defence Force's Central Command, died along with three other officers in a helicopter crash early last Wednesday. Tamari, 45, was the highest-ranking officer to die in the line of duty in nearly a dozen years. Also killed were Tamari's aide and two air force captains. The army ruled out sabotage, saying the crash was caused by bad weather.

Goren Shouldn't Be Charged

JERUSALEM — Shlomo Goren, Israel's former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi and chief military chaplain, should not be prosecuted for urging soldiers to disregard orders to evacuate Jewish settlements in the territories, Attorney-General Michael Ben-Yair decided this month. Ben-Yair ordered police to close their investigation into allegations of incitement and sedition against Rabbi Goren. Last month, the rabbi advised Israeli soldiers to refuse to obey any orders to participate in military operations to evacuate Jewish settlements from the territories. Rabbi Goren said there are "elements in the media that had an interest in my being brought to trial," and were behind the opening of the investigation.

Chabad Can Stay at Airport

JERUSALEM — Israel's Supreme Court has ruled that the Chabad Lubavitch movement may continue operating its booth in Ben-Gurion Airport, which offers religious services to travelers. However, the court imposed restrictions on Chabad, saying it may not distribute religious material to those who do not solicit it and may not preach Chabad "ideology." The ruling was a response to petitions challenging the Chabad operation filed by the left-wing Meretz bloc and the Movement for Progressive Judaism, the Israeli branch of the Reform movement.

Cooperation Pledged in MIA Search

JERUSALEM — The American congressional team investigating the fate of the six missing Israeli servicemen has told the soldiers' families that they were promised full cooperation by both Syrian and Lebanese authorities and hoped to see results of their investigation in the coming weeks. The team, led by Michael van Dusen, chief of staff of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, was able to search the area of the 1982 battle near Sultan Yakub in eastern Lebanon, in which three of the soldiers disappeared. It was the first such visit to the area by American officials and was made possible only following Syrian promises to aid the U.S. humanitarian effort. The investigators, escorted by Syrian and Lebanese troops, took soil samples from gravesites and interviewed villagers at length.

War Crimes Trials Expected

LONDON — Britain's first Nazi war crimes trials are expected to take place this year, parliamentary sources said last week. The hearings would be the first under the controversial 1991 War Crimes Act, which was passed despite fierce opposition, especially from some members of the House of Lords. A spokesman for the all-party Parliamentary War Crimes Group, which spearheaded the campaign to pass the act, said there were strong indications that investigations by Scotland Yard's Nazi-hunting war crimes unit were nearing completion. A number of prosecutions are being planned, the spokesman believes. But he described as "speculative and premature" reports that a decision already had been made to charge at least three suspects. The director of public prosecution is known to be examining interim reports on the cases of at least 10 suspected Nazi criminals.

Dutch Won't Ban Film

AMSTERDAM — Rejecting arguments by Dutch Jewish groups, the public prosecutor here will not ban the public showing in Holland of the controversial German film Profession: Neo-Nazi. The film, in which a young neo-Nazi spouts anti-Semitic rhetoric and denies that any Jews were killed at Auschwitz, created an uproar among Jewish groups in Germany upon its release late last year. The banning of the film in Holland had been requested by Jewish groups and by the Foundation for Combatting Anti-Semitism. But after seeing the film, the public prosecutor concluded that although certain statements made by the title character were certainly anti-Semitic, the film itself was not.

Three Youths in Custody

TEL AVIV — Three ninth-graders from an upscale neighborhood in Herzliya have been placed in police custody for the murder of a taxi driver, sending shock waves through the nation. Police originally suspected that the murder of Derek Roth had been the work of a terrorist, since neither his money nor his documents had been stolen. Roth was found two weeks ago slumped over the wheel of his car. He had been shot in the back of his head. Last week, the three teen-agers, ages 15 and 16, were overheard boasting about the murder to classmates, to whom they reportedly showed the pistol they had stolen to commit the crime. After overhearing them, the mother of another student informed authorities.

By RABBI MORDECHAI BULUA

This week's Torah reading, Yisro, contains the Aseres HaDibros, the Ten Commandments. The Decalogue was given on two tablets of stone. Why? Surely G-d had the ability to put all Ten Commandments on one tablet. If you look at the first five, you will notice they all contain, in some form or another, the name of G-d. In the second five, no mention is made of G-d's name in any form. Why the discrepancy?

Our rabbis explain that it signifies the two different areas of concern of both the Ten Commandments and the Torah. The Ten Commandments are equally placed on two tablets because there are two categories of the law. The first tablet deals with our relationship to G-d and the second with our relationships with people. The person who is outwardly pious, but steals, cheats and hurts his neighbor is not religious despite appearances to the contrary. By disregarding the major principles of the second tablet, he or she does not accept the word of G-d.

Rabbi Levi Yitzchak of Berditchev once said: "Whether a man really loves G-d can be determined by the love he bears toward his fellow men." The Israeli cartoon of the bank robber who kisses the mezuzah on his way out sends a message to those who would hurt other human beings while at the same time keeping the rituals of religion. Similarly, the person who is good to his fellow man but does not keep any of the rituals of Judaism is also remiss. We need G-d in our lives and the first tablet makes demands on our relationship with Him.

We cannot split religion. The five fingers on each of our two hands should serve not only as a constant reminder of the Ten Commandments but also of the two main categories of mitzvot; our duties to G-d as well as to man.

Two tablets

A non-Jew came to Hillel and asked him to teach him all of Judaism while standing on one foot. Hillel responded: "What is hateful to you, do not do unto your neighbor."

How could anyone expect to be taught the entire Torah on one foot? Our sages suggest that the non-Jew was alluding to a fundamental question. Knowing that there were two tablets given to Moses at Mount Sinai, one representing commandments between man and G-d and the other representing commandments between man and man, the non-Jew wanted to know which one (foot) is the foundation of Judaism.

Hillel's answer, reiterated by Rabbi Akiva many years later, was that love of one's fellow man was the great principle of the Torah. Hillel could have answered with the verse recited right after the Shema: "And you shall love G-d with all your heart, with all your soul, and with all your might." But he didn't. For once and for all, he wanted to show that if both cannot be performed simulaneously, take care of a person in need. G-d will wait. A starving or drowning person can't.

If the second five of the Ten Commandments, those dealing with other people are more important in G-d's eyes, why were they engraved on the second tablet of the Law rather than the first?

The first word of the Ten Commandments is Anochi "I," referring to G-d, and the last word is le-re-echa "to your fellow man." We start off with G-d and we end with our fellow man. Loving our neighbor as ourselves is the goal, but the means to attain it is through accepting G-d by obeying the commandments between man and G-d.

We are required to act both for the sake of heaven and for the sake of man. The collective name of the Jewish people, Yisrael in Hebrew, can be read as two words: Yashar E-l. Yasher means trustworthiness and virtuousness in human relations. E-l is one of the names of G-d. Together, they proclaim not only who we are, but also define our purpose and raison d'etre in this world.

As King Solomon wrote: (Proverbs 3:3-4) "Do not let lovingkindness and truth forsake you; bind them about your neck, write them on the "tablet" of your heart. And so find grace and good favor in the eyes of G-d and man."

Italian Jews may face choice between Passover and polls

ROME (JTA) — Scandal-plagued Italy is planning elections that are expected to redraw the country's political landscape and usher in a new political era.

Passover may coincide with these watershed elections. The first two days of the holiday, March 27 and 28, are being considered as possible polling dates.

Rome's chief rabbi, Elio Toaff, has written to President Oscar Luigi Scalfaro and Interior Minister Nicola Mancino, urging that the vote not be scheduled for March 27.

The Rome daily Il Messaggero also reported last week that Tullia Zevi, president of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, contacted authorities to point out that legal agreements between the state and the Jewish community stipulate respect for religious holidays.

"I hope that the rights of a religious minority are not trampled upon," Toaff said in an interview with the newspaper.

"I also believe that the highest levels of the state are sensitive to our request, which only reiterates respect for our community, which is an integral part of Italian society and thus wants to participate fully in such an important election."

About 40,000 Jews live in Italy, out of a population of 58 million. About 30,000 Italian Jews have the right to vote.

Though nominally Orthodox, most Italian Jews are not strictly observant.

Toaff rejected the argument that most Jews would not be so observant on Passover that it would prevent them from casting their ballots.

"That is a ridiculous argument," he told Il Messaggero. "It would be like asking Catholics to not celebrate Christmas. Jewish law calls for a day of rest (on festival days).

"The days of Passover should be dedicated to meditation and spiritual recovery. Every Jew should be free to pray, without being afflicted by daily encumbrances, even such important ones as voting, which none of us wants to renounce."

Arafat criticized as accord remains on hold

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Yasser Arafat's prestige and authority appear to be declining as Israel and the PLO struggle to implement their September 1993 Declaration of Principles on limited Palestinian autonomy.

With one deadline already having passed, Arafat is worried that his credibility will be further diminished if Israel does not pull out its troops from the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho by April 13.

But, as he strongly suggested last week, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin may disregard this target date if Israel and the PLO fail to resolve their differences fairly soon.

If there are more delays, as now seems likely, Palestinian backing for the peace accord will probably erode and, with it, Arafat's claim to leadership of the splintered PLO.

Palestinians in the territories who supported the PLO's accord with Israel hoped that it would result in a speedy Israeli withdrawal, bring about the prompt release of some 12,000 Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails and give their depressed economy a quick shot in the arm.

But as Palestinians have seen few tangible changes since Rabin and Arafat shook hands on the White House lawn four months ago, the mood has definitely soured.

And euphoria has given way to bitterness since the killing of two Fatah leaders at the hands of Israeli soldiers (the Fatah faction of the PLO is controlled by Arafat), and attacks on Palestinian civilians by extremist Israeli settlers.

Due to these chilling developments, the Palestinians of Gaza and the West Bank are noticeably less enthusiastic about the PLO's pact with Israel.

According to the Nablus-based Centre for Palestine Research and Studies, only 42 percent of those questioned back the agreement, compared to 65 percent who supported it in September. What is more, support for Fatah has fallen from nearly 46 percent to 41 percent, while support for Hamas — which vehemently rejects the accord and Israel's existence — grew from 8 percent to 15 percent.

In yet another sign of growing Palestinian dissatisfaction, a coalition of Islamic fundamentalists and leftists defeated Fatah supporters in student council elections at Bir Zeit University, the West Bank's leading academic institution.

Meanwhile, Arafat has come under heavy criticism for his negotiating skills, his autocratic style, his jetset lifestyle and the material excesses of his much younger wife, his impatience with democracy and his tolerance of cronyism and corruption.

The PLO was a house divided before the agreement, but today it is positively riven by factionalism.

Since September, nearly half the members of the PLO's executive committee have resigned in protest over the agreement, while scores of young activists in the territories have quit. At the same time, eight of Arafat's most important lieutenants in Gaza and Lebanon have been assassinated by rejectionists.

The Palestinians who've distanced themselves from Arafat read like a Who's Who of the Palestinian movement: Mahmoud Darwish, an executive committee member and former Israeli Arab; Shafik al-Hout, the PLO's top official in Lebanon; Hani and Khalid al-Hassan, founders of Fatah; Abbas Zaki, a senior Fatah commander in Gaza; Abu Tayeb, commander of Force 17, an elite commando group; Farouk Kaddoumi, the PLO's foreign minister; Haidar Abdelshafi, who headed the Palestinian delegation at the Madrid peace conference in October 1991; and Hanan Ashrawi, the PLO's spokesperson.

In addition, Edward Said — a former member of the Palestine National Council and arguably the PLO's most eloquent voice in the English language — has joined the opposition.

Writing in the current edition of Harper's Magazine, Said, a professor of English at Columbia University, describes the agreement as a "Palestinian capitulation" and "an instrument of Palestinian surrender."

Most of all, Said is angry because Arafat relinquished the right of Palestinians to return to their old homeland, while Jews from around the globe are free to settle in Israel. "This extraordinary inequity, intolerable to Palestinians for almost half a century, has to be rectified," he observes.

These Diaspora Palestinians, he adds, originally brought Arafat to power, kept him there, and "now are relegated to permanent exile or refugee status."

Apart from taking Arafat to task for his so-called myopic policies, Said's disillusionment stems from Arafat's "dictatorial ways, his single-minded control over (the PLO's) money, his insular circle of sycophants and courtiers, and his lack of accountability."

Said writes that Arafat's opponents are not confined to Islamic fundamentalists. He is right. Among his most vociferous critics are secular nationalists and former Arafat allies like George Habash of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, Nayef Hawatmeh of the Democratic Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and Ahmed Jibril of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine — General Command.

Based in Damascus, these groups are not only ardent opponents of last September's agreement, but unreconciled to Israel's very existence as a Jewish/Zionist state.

It remains to be seen whether Arafat can fend off these challengers, keep the PLO reasonably intact and transform it from a revolutionary movement into one capable of ruling a nation-in-the-making.

Arafat is under tremendous pressure from his constituents to make good on his promise that his agreement with Israel will eventually lead to Palestinian statehood, and not stop at Gaza and Jericho. In the meantime, Arafat refers to himself as the "president of Palestine."

Rabin, however, is against the idea of a Palestinian state, at least for now, and regards the Declaration of Principles as strictly an interim arrangement.

The agreement, while causing a rift in Palestinian ranks, has set into motion a process that will, at a minimum, give the Palestinians a modicum of sovereignty, and enable the PLO to normalize relations with such countries as the United States, Canada, Germany and Japan.

But if the accord — an historic achievement in the annals of the Middle East — is not implemented with dispatch, Arafat may find himself out of a job, and the hopes and dreams that the agreement inspired may be dashed.

At last Israel is cleaning up its polluted rivers

By NECHEMIA MEYERS

Nation-wide efforts are at long last being made to clean up Israel's polluted rivers and streams.

Charged with co-ordinating these efforts is the recently established National Streams Authority. But, meanwhile, it is the National Sewage Authority, only a little older, that is having the greatest impact. The reason: it has $100 (U.S.) a year to subsidize the construction of sewage-treatment plants (which, it is hoped, will eventually put an end to the dumping of raw effluents into Israeli waterways).

The condition of those waterways has steadily worsened over the years, because most of the rainfall and spring water that once flushed them out is now piped away for the use of cities, farms and factories. They, in return, churn out liquid pollution.

Thus while Jerusalem is supplied with water from the springs of the coastal plain, it sends largely untreated sewage flowing back down to the coastal plain, sewage that creates a vile stench from the Judean Hills to the Mediterranean.

Even before the creation of the two aforementioned authorities, some progress was made by the establishment of local co-ordinating bodies to deal with the pollution of several particular waterways. Best known is the Yarkon River, which runs through Tel Aviv.

Thanks to the joint efforts of municipalities and other bodies in the Tel Aviv area, the Yarkon is a lot cleaner than it used to be and now, for the first time in many years, fish swim in its waters. But there are still occasional setbacks when municipal sewage plants break down or factories discharge pollutants; then the supply of fish has to be replenished.

Israel's newest cleanup effort is taking place near Ashdod, a shipping and manufacturing boomtown south of Tel Aviv. It involves the two-mile-long Lachish stream on the outskirts of the town, a waterway which used to be known for its wildlife and plants, but, over the years, has been ruined by sewage and waste dumping.

In charge of rehabilitating the area and creating a park along the banks of the stream is Aviva Harari, who says that, as a first stage, efforts will be made to clean up existing pollution, ensure proper treatment of effluents and regulate the waterway's southern channel. In addition, trees will be planted and roads paved — with the cost of these various activities being covered by the Jewish National Fund, the Israel Lands Authority, the Ministry of the Environment, the Ashdod Municipality and nearby local authorities.

Then, says Harari, a 180-acre park will be set up, including sports and sailing facilities, green open spaces, a promenade and recreational facilities. These will serve the growing local population and, it is hoped, an influx of tourists.

Speaking at the ceremony at which the project was inaugurated last month, Environment Minister Yossie Sarid stressed the fact that Israel is a small, crowded country, and likely to be considerably smaller and more crowded after it signs peace agreements with the Arabs. Therefore, Sarid declared, "We must make enormous efforts to clean up polluted areas and set aside green belts." Otherwise, he concluded, "we could all suffocate."

Yesterday's heroes fall by side in modern age

By ARNOLD AGES

The shelf life of heroes is not very long in our time. Just a few decades ago three Jews, Marx, Freud and Einstein, were hailed as the seminal and most revolutionary minds of the modern age. But how things have changed!

Marx's fame and photographs no longer repose in the sacred precincts of the Kremlin. Even before the demise of the former Soviet Union, Marxism, the famous British journal devoted to his ideology, closed shop. Now Marx, the co-author of The Communist Manifesto and Das Kapital, the man who was the patron saint of the "workers' paradise," is no longer the object of sacred scrutiny in proletarian classrooms. Mikhail Gorbachev and then Boris Yeltsin sealed Marx's fate; he is now persona non grata in the land where he once dominated, posthumously of course, all political discourse.

Even Albert Einstein's sterling reputation has tarnished considerably since his Nobel-prize days as the new Newton, hailed for his relativity theory and other pronouncements in physics. We always knew, of course, that he didn't like to wear socks but what is really disquieting is the recent revelation that Einstein failed to acknowledge his first wife's role in producing some of the mathematical formulae that led to his astounding discoveries in physics.

Even in the rarefied field of theoretical physics, it appears that after his sensational assertions about the curvature of light near massive objects, the space-time continuum and gravitational fields, he spent the remaining years of his life pursuing the elusive unified field theory — the famous theory of everything — which he never reached.

So obsessed was he with this theory that he was unable or unwilling to appreciate the insights of quantum mechanics, a branch of physics which repudiated traditional teachings about the determinacy of the ordered universe and replaced it at the sub atomic level with a randomized one subject only to probability laws.

When Einstein once said that God didn't play dice with the cosmos, he was rejecting the disordered, chaotic universe scenario. This was Einstein at his poetic best; however, the prose of modern physics suggests that Niels Bohr and the other collaborators in quantum theory were on the right path and Einstein had lost the trail.

Arnold Ages

The third genius in the troika of heros, Sigmund Freud, has also become the victim of deflation syndrome. In fact, dumping on Freud has become a kind of cottage industry involving specialists in the field of psychoanalysis, as well as lay people from diverse sectors. Freud's reputation has even been subjected to a withering assault in a cover story in Time magazine (Nov. 29, 1993) about the Viennese sage. It seems that Freud is now being held partly responsible, among other things, for the controversy over the false memory syndrome.

Sander Gilman, a professor at the Cornell Medical College, has now leaped into the fray with a new theory about Freud's creation of psychoanalysis. Gilman argues that Freud was reacting to the "medicalization" of anti-Semitism in the fin de siecle period in Germany and Austria, when he developed his new theories. By "medicalization," Gilman means the mountain of published research in the biological sciences which affirmed Jewish degeneracy on both the physiological and psychological levels.

Gilman, author of the book, The Case of Sigmund Freud, tries to show that German pseudo-science saw positive proof in the contour of the Jewish nose, foot and gait, that there was a genetically transmitted pathology which predisposed Jews to criminality and other unpleasant behavioral traits. The latter included overintellectualization and, supposedly, menstruation among Jewish males!

Where does Sigmund Freud enter Gilman's survey of the ludicrous direction in which the German biological sciences were moving in the fin de siecle period? According to Gilman, Freud and the entire psychoanalytical movement sought to parry the thrust of the all-pervasive anti-Semitic discourse by generalizing negative portraits of Jews into identikits of man-in-general and then seeking to propose a radically new approach to curing the ills in question by inventing a new medicine — psychoanalysis.

This occurred despite the fact that Freud considered himself a "godless Jew," and completely repudiated Jewish religious beliefs and practices. Yet his irreligion did not preclude his membership in the Jewish community of Vienna where his friends and culture "exemplified a Jewishness more binding than religious Orthodoxy."

It was within this context that Freud leapfrogged over the culturally saturated German language with its built-in "deprecation and menace towards the Jew" and created the new language of psychoanalysis with its Greek myths and oedipal archetypes.

Gilman further suggests that the language of psychotherapy was a surrogate for the Yiddish and Hebrew which assimilated Jews had either rejected or permitted to fall into disuse. In this scenario the Copernican revolution in medicine which Freud was supposed to have ushered into the modern age has lost some of its luster.

This interpretation of Freud, one of the most daring I have encountered, seems to remove him from the high pedestal he once occupied; Freud's psychoanalysis turns out to be only a highly sophisticated form of anti-defamation.

Arnold Ages, a professor at the University of Waterloo, is the newly appointed director of the university's journalism option.

Terrorism is terrorism

The Federal Bureau of Investigation and the New York Police Department are investigating the placement of two bombs outside buildings in Manhattan which house the offices of Americans for Peace Now and the New Israel Fund.

A police robot defused the first explosive, but the bomb in front of the New Israel Fund went off, causing neither damage nor injuries. According to the New York Times, a note left with the explosives was signed by a hitherto unknown organization called Shield of David Maccabee Squad, which accused the Israeli government of "selling out the Jewish people." This, of course, was a reference to Israel's historic 1993 agreement with the PLO on limited Palestinian autonomy, a pact which has yet to be implemented.

The Israeli consulate in New York was absolutely right to condemn the attack. Acts of violence and intimidation have no place whatsoever in the legitimate debate over the wisdom of Israel's accord with the PLO. Critics are, and should be, free to voice dissent. Yossi Beilin, Israel's deputy foreign minister, has rightfully encouraged such democratic debate. But it must always remain on the verbal level. Anything else is shameful and intolerable.

The government of Yitzhak Rabin was given a mandate by the Israeli electorate to work for peace within the framework of territorial compromise. Israel's agreement with the PLO falls squarely within this guideline. Those who claim that the duly elected Israeli government is a "minority" government would be well advised to remember that Israel has never had a "majority" government. Every Israeli cabinet since the days of David Ben-Gurion has been a coalition, as is Rabin's.

Thankfully, no one was hurt by the bombs, which could have caused serious injuries. The perpetrators who committed this crime should be brought to justice. Terrorism is terrorism.

Coming clean

Two years after Argentinian president Carlos Menem gave permission for his country's "Nazi files" to be opened to investigators, the world is discovering that the government of Buenos Aires turned its nation into the world's largest foyer for suspected Nazi war criminals.

Argentina's harboring of suspected Nazis after 1945 was indefensible and will continue to cast a pall over a country that seeks a place in the international arena.

But coming clean about that inglorious period in its recent history, and Argentina is the only Latin American country to do so, is a good first step in the rehabilitation process.

Researchers representing the World Jewish Congress and DIAA, Argentina's major Jewish organization, have unearthed the names of more than a thousand suspected war criminals who entered Argentina at the end of World War II. Adrian Jmelnizky, one of the senior researchers, says his group has not even gone through half of the Foreign Ministry archive.

The stunning finding is all the more surprising because it was believed Argentina authorities would have removed the offending files during the past 40 years. For complex bureaucratic reasons, however, the massive collection of Nazi dossiers has remained intact.

What have the files revealed? The New York Times (Dec. 14) indicates that in addition to new documents about well-known Nazis like Dr. Josef Mengele (he tried, in 1958, to get the Goethe University in Frankfurt to restore his medical degree), there is also much new information about Croatian fascists belonging to the Ante Pavelic group which found refuge in Argentina after the war.

Many of the other suspects mentioned in the archive materials are new to Nazi hunters. They are lesser known Nazi subordinates and collaborators, many of whom were in their 40s and 50s when they arrived in Argentina. Some of the individuals mentioned in the Foreign Ministry documents were sentenced to death in absentia by European governments.

The governments of Juan Peron and those that followed him, until 1991 turned a blind eye to warnings by American, British and French governments that Nazis would be trying to enter Argentina. The reason Buenos Aires disregarded these warnings is also found in the archives.

Documents dating from the early 1930s indicate that Argentinian diplomats were impressed with Hitler's totalitarian regime and his ability to cultivate nationalism, xenphobia and indifference to violence — elements which surfaced in the 1970s during the junta's "dirty war" which claimed 10,000 innocent lives, and to which Jewish Argentinian writer Jacobo Timerman added such piognant testimony in his prison memoir, Prisoner Without A Name, Cell Without A Number, published in 1981.

Letters to the Editor

ASSAD'S PROMISES

Your editorial writer must read with only one eye, or listen with only one ear.

In considering recent announcements from Syria as "heartening" (Syria's move, Dec. 23) reference is made to the hope that on humanitarian grounds as well as benefiting the peace process, Syria should make good on its commitment to assist in locating the six Israeli servicemen who disappeared some years ago.

It is also suggested in that editorial that Syria should help resolve the disapearance of the eight Beiruti Jewish community leaders kidnapped nine years ago.

Missing completely, however, is the fact that Syria's Hafez Assad gave a double commitment to U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher. Missing is any reference to Assad's undertaking that the remnant of the Syrian Jewish Community of some 1,200 souls, will be granted the right to travel abroad by the end of December. That was an important episode in the long struggle to free the Syrian Jewish community and is as important in Syria's "rehabilitation" as the other promise.

Only time will tell if there is any greater credibility to Assad's promise than to the Syrians' other statements.

IN-DEPTH INTERVIEWS

May I say that I like very much your exclusive interviews with different personalities. It gives us a chance to see the characters of the people you are interviewing more in depth, so to say, sometimes not enough, but at least something. I hope you will continue with this.

I should say that such interviews need not be only with Jewish people, but with any non-Jews who, by their positions or personalities, are highly relevant to us as Jews, politicians in Quebec, Ontario and at the federal level, for instance.

All the interviews have been at a first-class level, I think, and when Sheldon Kirshner goes abroad, he brings some relevant interviews back with him.

You are running a very good paper, from the Jews' standpoint, and which we need, very badly.

WHY NO ACTION?

You report that the opening of previously secret World War II files reveal that Winston Churchill knew that more than 8,000 men and women had died in the Auschwitz Concentration Camp in August of 1942.

Undoubtedly the information was more specific than that and in all probability revealed that the victims were gassed and otherwise murdered. If Winston Churchill knew then surely Franklin Roosevelt and Josef Stalin and MacKenzie King knew.

Why therefore did the pleading of western Jewish leaders that the allies bomb the Auschwitz facility fall on deaf ears? Perhaps as more files are opened in the United States, Canada and elsewhere it will become apparent that the reason for the inaction was not indifference or lack of information but simply pervasive anti-Semitism in the government circles of the Allies.

CAMP DORA GOLDING

In 1925 Camp Deal was founded to give Jewish boys a summer respite from the harsh realities of immigrant life in New York City. Over the years the camp has served thousands of children from all segments and economic strata of the Jewish community. In 1966, the camp's name was changed to Camp Dora Golding. In 1971, the camp moved from its original home in Deal, New Jersey, to East Stroudsburg, Pennyslvania. In 1989, a girls camp, located in Pomona, New York, was founded.

In anticipation of Camp Dora Golding's 70th anniversary celebration we are trying to locate and make contact with as many former campers and staff members as possible so that they might share their memories of Camp Deal or Camp Dora Golding with us.

CULTURE OF JEWISH CUISINE

I am working on a book about the culture of Jewish cuisine. I am interested in hearing from people who have memories, stories and recipes from their homelands. I have a special interest in traditions and customs surrounding the celebration of holidays and festivities, in addition to unique recipes. It would be especially helpful if you remembered details of preparations for the holidays, stories or rituals handed down from parents and grandparents, special roles of the women, and customs or games especially for the children.

Re: "Visit to Yad Vashem gives educators new outlook on teaching the Holocaust," Dec. 23, page 19.

It is the belief of the Canadian Society For Yad Vashem that the most effective way of countering revisionists with their lies is through education. For the past two years, the Canadian Society For Vad Vashem has been sending teachers and sponsoring them to this seminar for educators held at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

Haia Hason and Gayle Edwards who were mentioned in the article, are two of the teachers who have been sponsored by us. The focus of the seminar is how to teach Holocaust studies in high schools. This project as a whole has immense educational value in deepening knowledge and awareness of Holocaust facts in our schools.

As a result of our benefit concert for Holocaust studies scholarships in October, we are able to send four teachers to this seminar in 1994. Any teacher who is interested in applying for a scholarship for this seminar should write no later than Jan. 30, 1994 to Miriam Gelbloom, co-chairman, Canadian Society For Yad Vashem, 2180 Highway 7, unit 12a, Concord, Ontario, L4K 2S9 or call the office at 660-6028.

SEEKS WITNESSES

I am seeking Canadians who served in the Allied Forces during World War II and who know firsthand or know of someone who came into contact with my late mother, Giulia Sylvia Traub (nee Ghezzi).

A non-Jew, my mother was born in 1910 and lived in Arrezzo, Italy. Following the German occupation, she hid and provided shelter and food for Italian Jewish citizens and escaped Allied PoWs. Many of the escaped PoWs came from a transit camp in Laterina. I am trying to have her recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations.

All information may be sent to: The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, 2180 Highway 7, Unit 12A, Concord, Ont., L4K 2S9, Tel.: (905) 660-6028.

Russia's Vladimir Zhirinovsky is certainly no joke

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

People all over the world are following the recent Russian election with much concern. They see an ominous parallel between Vladimir Zhirinovsky and Adolf Hitler. Unfortunately, the comparison is not unwarranted.

Hitler rose to prominence and then to power after the defeat of the German Reich in 1918, which was followed by rampaging inflation, terrible economic dislocation and unemployment. He enunciated a few simple goals that the disaffected could readily understand: restore national pride, recover the rightful place in the German Reich, reserve Germany for true Germans, and get rid of the Jews. Their elimination would provide Germany with the key to economic, cultural and political recovery.

Books have been written about Hitler's demonic preoccupation with "Jewish power," and no doubt there will be special attention given to this part of Zhirinovsky's fulminations as well. Jews figure in his appeals, sometimes violently, sometimes in a more muted mode, but they always seem to figure somewhere, and negatively so.

There is a most fascinating story that Zhirinovsky's father (who died when his child was only one-year-old) was most likely Jewish. His first name was Wolf — a name with which I am quite familiar since it is my own name too. Wolf was often given to Jewish children in Central and Eastern Europe — sometimes in its Hebrew form, Ze'ev, and sometimes in its diminutive, Velvel. It also seems that Zhirinovsky was involved in some Jewish activities during the Communist regime, and at that time appears to have identified with his people. Now he vigorously denies any Jewish descent, and proclaims that his father was Russian, all-Russian.

Rabbi Plaut

Methinks he protesteth too much. If in fact his Jewish connection turns out to be real and undeniable, his anti-Jewishness assumes an interesting form of self-hate for which there is ample historical precedent.

Back in the 13th to 15th centuries some Jews who had converted to Christianity believed that they had to demonstrate their allegiance to their new faith by denouncing the Jews. Prominent amongst these anti-Jewish apostates were Nicholas Donin of France, Pablo Christiani and Joshua Lorki of Spain, and Petrus Schwartz (Niger) of Germany.

All of these vigorously defamed their former people and religion, but none of them as viciously as a certain Abner of the Spanish town of Burgos. He tried to curry favor with the Christians by working out elaborate schemes to kill Jews, and he even tried to persuade the authorities that widespread massacres would persuade Jews that it would be better to be Christian than dead. Fortunately, Christian authorities found his proposal disgusting rather than attractive.

There was also, in our own time, a persistent rumour that the cruellest of the Nazi monsters, Reinhart Heydrich, was partly of Jewish descent. Heydrich was one of Hitler's "golden boys" and was given responsibility not only for the Gestapo, the Chief Security Office, and the governorship of Czechoslovakia, but also was entrusted with the extermination of the Jews. It was Heydrich who convened the Wannsee Conference in January 1942, when the Holocaust was officially and efficiently planned.

I often heard it said that Heydrich was so eager to kill Jews because he felt that he had to prove to Hitler that he was 100 per cent German, even though his grandmother was said to have been a certain Sarah. Maybe — but a book by J. Robinson threw cold water on this theory and provided evidence that the Heydrich myth was just that: a myth.

True or not, the very idea that people with a Jewish connection sometimes will turn against their own forebears in order to prove themselves to others, is a recurring phenomenon. So apparently it is with Zhirinovsky.

That of course gives us little comfort. Unfortunately, we shall hear more about this man whom some declare to be nothing more than a loud-mouthed joker. They said the same about Hitler. The media are already paying attention, but I hope they will do it right this time and not make this man into a kind of cult hero. The precedent is frightening enough.

American Jewish dropouts: what are they seeking?

By DEBRA COHEN

Lanie Poisson is one of an estimated 1.2 million people in America who were born Jews but who celebrate Christmas. That is roughly one-fifth of the American Jewish population. About half of these have converted to or actively identify with a faith other than Judaism, which in America is almost always Christianity.

The other 60,000 describe themselves as Jews by ethnicity or culture, but not by religion, according to data from the 1990 National Jewish Population Survey.

And "those Jews who say they're not Jewish by religion tacitly adopt Christian culture," said Samuel Klausner, a professor of sociology at the University of Pennsylvania and an expert on Jews who identify with other faiths.

Although they will describe themselves as "secular" or having some Jewish attachments, they are rarely, if ever, found in synagogues and are thoroughly assimilated into American liberal Protestant culture.

They have Christmas trees in their living rooms, wreaths on their doors, go to church on Christmas, have few Jewish friends and give to Christian, rather than Jewish, philanthropies, Klausner said.

Further, the Christian community does not think of them as Jews, he said. "Within a generation or so," Klausner said, "they become fully members of the Christian community."

Lanie Poisson was born Ilana Fox. Now 35, she is deeply involved in a fundamentalist Christian church.

Born to Holocaust survivors, she did not find a spiritual home in Judaism.

Poisson said that in her home in an all-Jewish neighborhood of Queens, New York, her parents' Jewish connection focused on politics and Israel.

The family would go to synagogue twice a year, on the High Holy Days, and would have a Passover seder. On Chanukah, the family would light a menorah and exchange presents.

When she and her sister were asked whether they wanted to go to Hebrew school, they declined. As a teen-ager, Poisson began asking existential spiritual questions of religious Jews in her extended family, and of non-Jews she knew through school. She did not find any satisfying answers, but put aside her search for a few years.

A decade ago, an acquaintance who was part of a fundamentalist church challenged her to read the Bible. She read the Jewish and Christian Bibles, and went to the rabbis with questions about messianic prophecy.

"I found that I didn't get answers to my questions because they weren't knowledgeable about it, and my faith grew more in seeing how the scriptures fit together," she said.

"I always wanted to make a difference in the world, and never associated it with anything spiritual before I began to read," she said. Four months later, she was baptized.

A couple of years later she married the man who had first introduced her to the church, and today their lives, and those of their children, revolve around the church.

Poisson's story illustrates the search of many converts.

"These are Jewish people yearning for something meaningful spiritually in their religious lives, and the Judaism they knew was empty," said Rabbi Tovia Singer, director of Jews for Judaism of Greater New York.

Klausner said part of the responsibility for the conversions and Jews' identification with Christianity lies with churches. "They are in collusion with this. They have become very lax about their own requirements for membership. They don't ask you if you're baptized anymore, so Jews are just sitting in churches," he said.

But Klausner does not fault missionaries from evangelical and "Hebrew-Christian" churches. "Evangelizing is an opportunity for people who already have the tendencies to move out," he said.

While Jews who become Christians often say they feel liberated from "the whole picture of Judaism," they usually are making a transition from less commitment and involvement to a more stringent system, said Klausner.

The reason Jews seek out Christianity, he said, is the breakdown of Jewish religious authority, without which there is "no way of ordering meaning, so people seek meaning by going to another, more structured system."

"By the second and third generation of Jews who identify more with Christianity than with Judaism, people move into fundamentalist churches where they have to make a declaration" of commitment, he said.

According to Singer, many converts from Judaism to Christianity become "born-again" Christians. "Our studies have found that 67 per cent of 'Hebrew-Christians' went to Hebrew school. It's that little bit of information that turns Jews off," Singer said.

Judaism's "spiritual elements are often not taught and transmitted," he added "Liberal denominations sometimes throw out our most precious fruit, our personal relationship with God," said Singer. (JTA)

Sunny beaches just can't compare with cold climes

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

South Florida's January sunshine and palm trees are no longer enough for our children. How are we going to keep them down on the beach once they've learned to ski?

Travelling with another couple, we spent the winter holidays introducing their two daughters and our three children — daughters, ages 10 and 7 and son, 3 — to snow. The kids will never be the same. From the moment our jet slipped between the mountain peaks and landed in Gunnison, Colorado, until the chilly minute we took off again 10 days later, our tropical ninos conducted a non-stop love affair with bright but bitter cold winter.

I fell in love with the snowy Rockies five years ago, in Banff, on our dreamy tenth anniversary trip, but for the children, this was their first look at wonderland. And although I firmly believe that the drive from Banff to Jasper is the most magnificent auto excursion on the planet, the Colorado Rockies offer some short bursts of competition.

Our little boy, swathed in his first snowsuit, marched down the steps of the airplane and onto the freezing tarmac. He gazed with delight at the towering white and gray mountains and announced immediately, "I like this Cod-oh-rod-oh." This opinion — held firmly also by his sisters and their friends — never wavered. Through skiing, snowman building, sledding, walking, running, slipping and sliding, they stayed ecstatic. You would think that children who are wearing boots full of snow and mittens dripping freezing water would have the sense to come indoors — or at least the sense to be miserable.

No such thing. "Just give me my dry gloves, Mom," said my 7-year-old, plunging back into the snow. "I only want my fingers to stop zinging and zizzing."

Erica Meyer Rauzin

This is the child who taught us the difference between brave and fearless. She, her elder sister and their two buddies attended the excellent children's ski camp in Mount Crested Butte, where we stayed. The 10-year-old grasped my point of view about snow skiing instantly: some of this is scary; the height, the steepness, the fastness, the coldness. And she was daunted, for a day or so, until — with a private lesson and a little encouragement — she got back on skis (that was brave) and was soon soaring down the mountain with the rest of the happy campers.

It never occurred to the 7-year-old to be afraid. We discovered that we've been nurturing a speed demon in our midst, a child seeking thrills unavailable in her previous life as a flat-land bike rider. When the other children wove careful S-curves down the mountain, she'd pick a centre path and fly straight like a bullet, hurtling to the foot as fast as she could go, happiest creature on the planet — totally fearless.

My husband, an experienced skier, skied with her a couple of times to make sure she was being cautious enough to avoid catastrophe. He said she was. You couldn't prove that by me. I'd stand with the other bunny mommies at the foot of the slopes, watching our children emerge from the sun-white glare as the camp day ended and they all skied into the kiddy compound. I'd see all the other children traverse their cautious paths into the "landing" area, swooping side to side as best as they could, wending down the mountain. And then amid them, I'd see this one little figure, my former delicate hothouse flower, zooming directly downward, bolting headlong, bound for glory, fastest gun in the west.

Meanwhile, the 3-year-old went to a great play group, learned to love sledding and snow-ball making, and kept up with the big kids in every other way. He even tried lessons on super-short skies. (He could slide, but he couldn't stop.)

Our vacation days were filled with skiing, except Shabbat, which we spent exhausted in the condo, drinking hot chocolate and making do cozily with the entire suitcase full of books and toys we schlepped along. (We brought a staggering 10 suitcases: seven full of clothing and two stuffed with kosher food and gear, plus the toys and book bag — and that doesn't count the eight bags our friends brought.) It sounds ridiculous, but we had everything we needed, and then some.

Our successful vacation at last came to an end, and we flew home. We arrived late at night, pooped but happy, batteries recharged, ready — I thought — to face the next day's challenges of school and work. Before unpacking, I went to our son's room to tuck him in. "Get some sleep," I told him, "Tomorrow you'll go to nursery school."

"No," he said, shaking his head. "Tomorrow, we go back to Cod-oh-rod-oh."

Education – key to rebuilding community

Sheldon Kirshner visits Jewish schools and educational institutions in Moscow and St. Petersburg.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Jakob Tsukerman is emphatic.

"If we're going to rebuild our community," declared the St. Petersburg Jewish newspaper editor, "the first step is eduation, education and education."

There is much to be said for Tsukerman's remark. Observers agree that, after seven decades of Soviet Communist repression of Jewish culture, Jewish life in all its manifold forms cannot be fully resuscitated unless a strong educational system is put into place.

The process has begun. Today, in Russia, there is a growing network of day schools, Sunday schools, yeshivahs and colleges, nearly all of which emerged in the waning years of communism.

The phenomenon, which would have been unimaginable a decade ago, elicits a sense of wonder and accomplishment among those who are directly involved.

"Russia is the place to be if you're working in the field of Jewish education," observed Simcha Fishbain, the Toronto-born director of Touro College in Moscow. Touro College, with three separate but related schools in Russia, is a fully-accredited, New York-based institute of higher learning which has a second overseas branch in Jerusalem.

"Here, you can plant a seed and watch it grow. It's the Jewish world's obligation to encourage and support these educational endeavors as long as the excitement remains."

The Moscow National Jewish Day School, with its Sunday school, was founded in 1991.

With 250 students aged seven to 17, and a staff of 50 teachers, the day school is the biggest of its kind in Moscow. It's also the only Jewish government-supported state school in the Russian capital. Tuition is free.

"If we didn't believe in the future, we wouldn't have opened the school," said its principal, Grigory Lipman, a 45-year-old professional teacher. "Education is the key to our revival."

Such is its reputation that the school could easily accommodate twice as many students. Lipman is aware of the demand. "We need a new building. We're planning for it."

To Lipman's satisfaction, the school has tried a student/teacher exchange program with Atlanta, Georgia. Now Lipman wants to expand contacts with the Diaspora and, if possible, to start a pen pal club.

On the other side of Moscow, off a main road, stands Migdal Ohr, an Orthodox day school. Established in the spring of 1991, Migdal Ohr has 140 students, including 35 girls, aged 14 to 16. It's funded by Aaron Wolfson, an American philanthropist.

Sasha Atcherkan, 36, is in charge of secular studies. He is a typical Soviet Jew, inasmuch as he was more or less ignorant of Judaism when he was hired. "I didn't know the difference between Purim and Pesach," he admitted.

He believes that most of his graduates will eventually make aliyah. "It's hard to maintain a Jewish life in Russia outside the yeshivah and the synagogue," he noted. "Jewish families are afraid. We don't know what tomorrow will bring." Atcherkan made his comments in early October, when the spectre of a right-wing coup hung over Moscow.

In any event, he, too, plans to leave. His parents live in Tel Aviv. His wife's parents settled in Denver.

Rabbi Israel Taub, the Israeli headmaster of Jewish studies, has two objectives. "We want to bring Judaism to our students. But our main aim is to bring the boys to Israel. It's not my goal to build a Russian Jewish community. We realize, however, that some boys will remain in Russia."

* * *

Simcha Fishbain, the director of Touro College, works on the assumption that "a very large segment" of the Jewish population will stay rather than emigrate.

But he has no illusions about the state of Russian Jewry. As he put it, "Real Jewish life doesn't exist. There is no Jewish atmosphere, no Jewish neighborhoods."

He added, "One of the greatest cultural Jewish holocausts was in the Soviet Union. They (Jews) were on the bottom level. In another generation, they would have been lost.

"The intermarriage rate is unbelievably high — 70 to 80 percent. On an overall basis, for the whole country, it's probably the highest in the world."

Fishbain, who has been in Moscow for the past 2½ years, said assimilation made such deep inroads that, even today, "most Jews are not interested in coming out of the closet."

With Touro College, a secular institute which identifies with no single stream of Judaism, he hopes to foster a new class of homegrown teachers and administrators who can begin to reverse the effects of communism.

"We're creating a new generation of bubbies and zaydes, but we're starting from scratch."

Beginning with 50 students in October 1991, Touro College has 650 today. Its staff of 40 teachers consists of locals and foreigners.

The college is composed of a School of Jewish Studies, a Yiddish Teachers' Institute and a business school.

The first is sub-divided into a department of general Jewish studies, a teacher training department sponsored by the Jewish Agency, a Yiddish studies program and a Hebrew and English department.

The study of Hebrew is mandatory, but Yiddish is near and dear to the the college's president, Bernard Lander. "Yiddish was strongly achored in this country," said Fishbain. "For many Jews, Yiddish is their only form of identification with Judaism. Some of these people here wouldn't seek out their Jewish identity if not for Yiddish. When they come here, their interest is not in Pesach or Yom Kippur. They remember that their grandparents spoke Yiddish."

The annual budget for all three divisions is $1 million (U.S.), said Fishbain, 49, a graduate of Toronto's Associated School, New York's Yeshiva University and Montreal's Concordia University.

Fishbain arrived in Moscow via Israel, where he had been a career officer in the Israeli army and a Jewish Agency official.

"It's hard for a foreigner to live in Moscow, especially someone who's Orthodox," he observed. "But the feeling of accomplishment overcomes the difficulties."

St. Petersburg's Jewish University, in drab rented quarters in a depressing semi-industrial neighborhood, was founded in 1989 by Jewish activists. It has 300 students and a teaching staff of 70. There is a sister campus in Moscow.

Fully accredited, the university offers courses in history, ethnography, philology and Torah. This year, a department of journalism will be inaugurated. Wide-ranging in its scope, the university is also known for its teachers' college, its Institute for Research of the Diaspora, its Institute of Problems in Jewish Education and its Scientific and Information Center.

Its library of nearly 40,000 volumes in Hebrew, Yiddish, Russian, English, Polish and other languages is considered one of the best of its kind in the former Soviet Union.

The university publishes academic literature, a children's haggadah and a Jewish calendar. In the near future, it will publish a book on former shtetls and synagogues in the old Soviet Union. The university has undertaken more than 30 ex-peditions to locate former Jewish buildings and memorials throughout the ex-Soviet Union.

Exchange programs are in effect with Yeshiva University, Bar-Ilan University and the Hebrew University.

The university has numerous external sponsors, notably the Jewish Agency, the Joint and the Hebrew University. Nevertheless, it is short of books, equipment and qualified teachers. Its yearly budget is $120,000 (U.S.), said Dimiry Elyashevitch, the 31-year-old rector and dean of the departments of history and ethnography.

A history graduate of St. Petersburg State University, Elyashevitch is the son of assimilated, "absolutely secular" academics far removed from their Jewish background. "I was drawn to Jewish culture, in part, because it was forbidden fruit during the Soviet era," he explained.

Elyashevitch, whose grandparents are of Lithuanian origin, studied Jewish history in an underground school. He can read, but cannot speak, Hebrew and Yiddish.

The International Association for Jewish Studies and Jewish Culture in Moscow was founded in 1990. Its broad objective is the preservation of Jewish culture.

The association — headed by historian and philospoher Almin Rabinovich — issues a bulletin on Jewish life in Russian and English; runs seminars to upgrade the skills of Jewish lay leaders; sponsors a kindergarten and a secular Sunday school; encourages Russian universities to offer Judaica courses; and promotes research.

Rabinovich, 45, was remote from Jewish culture before 1967. But after the Six Day War, he began to take an interest in his heritage. "It was a turning point."

Now, as executive-director of the association, he is playing a vital, though unobtrusive, role in laying the foundations for a new, vital Jewish community in Russia.

Grigory Lipman (centre) is principal of the Moscow National Jewish School in Moscow. He is seen with teachers and pupils. [Sheldon Kirshner photo]

Fairly close to the consular section of the German Embassy, the school is housed in a renovated, non-descript building whose top floors are still used by the municipality.

The idea of setting up a day school came to Lipman during a visit to Israel. Returning to Moscow, he convinced the Ministry of Education that a Jewish day school was justifiable. That done, he began looking for a proper building. He embarked on the search in February 1991, and in May of that year, he found the present building at 97a Leninsky Prospect.

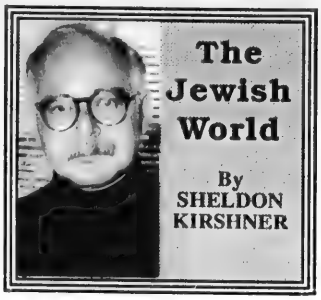
It needed extensive repairs and a top-to-bottom paint job. Since the government could not come up with the necessary funds, the cost of the renovation was borne by the International Association for Jewish Studies and Jewish Culture in Moscow.

By August, the building was ready. By Western standards, it is shabby, with broken, dirty tiles, soiled linoleum and a generally grim appearance.

Furthermore, there is a shortage of computers, computer programs, videos, TVs and books on Jewish themes in English and Hebrew.

The school depends on foreign assistance. Israel, for example, sends teachers, books and computers.

Despite its physical shortcomings, its academic standards are higher than most schools in Moscow, Lipman claimed. "We have nurtured an atmosphere of excellence. Our students have no problem getting accepted by universities. Our teachers are first-rate. Some are authors of school textbooks."



Jottings from a Russian notebook...

Tancred Golenpolsky, the 62-year-old editor of the Jewish Gazette, is an urbane and cosmopolitan man whose fluency in English and familiarity with American literature and Afro-American culture inspire something of a sense of wonder in a relatively isolated nation like Russia.

Yet, as a Jew, Golenpolsky was anything but in demand during the communist era, which ended with the collapse of the Soviet Union in December 1991.

Some years ago, he was invited to work for the prestigious United States and Canada Institute in Moscow. But shortly afterward, he was disinvited, firstly because he is Jewish, and secondly, because he was not a member of the Communist party.

Golenpolsky, who was born and raised in Shanghai, China, took the rejection in his stride. He became a respected translator of American novels, wrote seven books on the United States and hosted a radio show.

At the height of perestroika and glasnost, his talents were finally utilized by the government. Mikhail Gorbachev, president of the Soviet Union and secretary-general of the Communist party, asked him to join his entourage to the United States as a personal advisor.

Golenpolsky has been associated with the Jewish Gazette, Russia's largest Jewish newspaper, since its inception in 1989. It is a bi-weekly, with a circulation of 32,000, down from a high of 52,000. The readership has dropped precipitously because of insoluble distribution problems.

Editor's travails; cemetery overgrown

Three other Jewish newspapers are published in the Russian capital — Moscow Jerusalem, subsdized by the Jewish Agency; Jewish Life, financed by the Chorale Synagogue; and The Source, brought out by the Reform movement.

Golenpolsky, a board member of the Confederation of Jewish Organizations and Communities (Vaad), hopes to keep the Jewish Gazette politically independent, and to convert it into a publication that reflects the aspirations of "Russians who are Jewish."

St. Peterberg's sole Jewish cemetery, 10 kilometres from the centre of the city, is overgrown and poorly maintained. But it merits a visit. It is the last resting place of such personalities as Aleksandr Harkavy, the orientalist; Mark Antokolsky, the sculptor; and members of the Ginsburg clan, the 19th century philanthropists.

Among its mossy mausoleums is one that takes the form of a German Gothic cathedral. Its spire is topped off with an incongruous Star of David.

The Lubavitch movement is still fighting to regain possession of a library of 12,000 books and manuscripts confiscated by the Bolsheviks about 70 years ago. In 1991, the Russian Supreme Court ruled that the seized library should be returned to its rightful owner, but the decision has been ignored by the government.

Rabbi Berel Lazar, the 29-year-old Lubavitch emissary in Moscow, has no idea when, or even if, the authorities will relent. Last month, however, the American vice-president, Al Gore, obtained a copy of the Tanya, a revered volume from the library, and presented it to a Lubavitch representative.

Agudas Chassidei Chabad Synagogue, one of Moscow's three functioning shuls, is situated in a neighborhood that is swank by local standards. Andrei Gromyko, the late, long-serving Soviet foreign minister, resided in a walled villa just around the corner.

Anything is possible in Russia today. In a St. Petersburg neighborhood, an imposing statue of Mikhail Ivanovich Kalinin — the Soviet titular head of state from 1919 to 1946 — looks down solemnly on one of the hated symbols of capitalism, a glittering casino. The Conti Casino, which opened recently, is owned by a local Georgian Jew.

Kalinin, if not Gromkyko, must be spinning in his grave.

Extended Family

Licensed staff go through extensive training before they are allowed to direct a funeral at Benjamin's. They must first be thoroughly immersed in our ways and the countless acts that distinguish our services. The discipline they learn is that at a highly sensitive time, no detail may be left to take care of itself.

It is remarkable that every senior director who makes arrangements with families has worked with Benjamin's for at least 18 years. After being with us for so long, they are more than knowledgeable, helpful, comforting professionals. They've become like an extension of the Benjamin family. By all competitive standards, this is an impressive and reassuring qualification.

We are proud of all our directors and they way they uphold our traditions. They are Greg Gates, Pam Head, Phil Belanger, Robert Coddington, Paul Weaver, Larry Scheinman, Lisa Cook and Margo Stevenson.

In the old days, family cared for the body until burial. That's still true at Benjamin's today.

Rabbi helps to raise Jewish spiritualness

Rabbi Jerry Steinberg

TORONTO — About 10 years ago, Rabbi Jerry Steinberg received an invitation from 3 H O Kundalini Yoga and Meditation to teach folk dancing to the group's members.

A dance devotee since his early years growing up in Regina, Steinberg accepted the offer and ventured down to the group's ashram (spritual centre) in the Annex, to hold the dance workshop. Many of the group's members, readily identifiable by their white turbans and long flowing garments, participated in the program.

The lesson was progressing well when Steinberg turned his attention to some simple Israeli folk dances, including the horah and mayim. He admits he wasn't entirely surprised when about eight of the participants picked up the steps with hardly any prompting at all and then began singing along in Hebrew.

Steinberg says he was "pleased but saddened at the same time. I was pleased that they still remembered their heritage but sad that they had to reach out of it to find spirituality."

Steinberg, 58, believes that for many Jews, normative Judaism is too rational, cognitive and legalistic, and does not offer them a sufficiently intimate, personal and spiritual connection to God. That's why you can find so many Jews seeking that spiritual fulfilment in places like ashrams and in various Eastern religions, he says.

Disappointed that they have left Judaism to find fulfilment, yet sympathetic to the motivation that prompted them, Rabbi Steinberg believes that Judaism also has a strain which he calls "pnai or" (faces of light) that stresses a "more intimate, personal expression."

"Judaism has a tremendous tradition of literature, music and knowledge" that can address the longings of many Jews, he says.

In addition, techniques that are more closely associated with other faiths, such as deep breathing exercises, past life regression, repetitive chanting and yogic postures, can all be employed to assist in attaining "altered states of consciousness" and a mystical approach to God, he said.

Rabbi Steinberg is holding a series of six adult education classes at Temple Har Zion, which began on Jan. 11, on the Practical Applications to Find Higher States of Consciousness and to Get a Closer Relationship to God.

The rabbi is also spiritual advisor to a group called Kavanah, which is oriented towards Jews who have been "turned off of or are uninterested in normative Judaism and are looking for a more personal and experimental way of approaching Judaism."

Kavanah provides "a space where Jews can come and rediscover and be excited about Judaism," he said. "This is not a traditional venue but it has the utmost respect for our tradition and tries to bring into it a more personal experience."

A practical example of this "new age" approach to Judaism is seen weekly at the havdalah ceremony that marks the end of Shabbat. In addition to studying Torah, Rabbi Steinberg leads others in chants and in "guided visualization around the havdalah candle." In this context, he continues, the guided visualization involves closing one's eyes and meditating on images of light and radiance, in basking in the light and of seeing it as akin to the light of the shechina (divine presence).

While more closely associated with eastern religions, yogic breathing, body postures and mantras (repeating a sound over and over again) can also be found in the Jewish tradition, Rabbi Steinberg maintains. Chassidim often use repetitive melodies to bring them into altered states of consciousness, he said, while Abraham Abulafia, a medieval Jewish mystic, employed special breathing and postures to attain his spiritual goals.

"Yogic techniques have brought me to personal experiences that gave me a deeper understanding of prophetic traditions in the Zohar, Talmud, Torah and Midrash," Rabbi Steinberg says.

Rabbi Steinberg's personal odyssey began in the mid 1960s, when he attended the Jewish Institute of Religion at Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati. In 1965 he obtained his smicha (rabbinical ordination) but he did not feel he had "enough of a connection to God to preach to a congregation."

His good friend, Rabbi Zalman Schachter, chair of the department of Near Eastern and Judaic Studies at the University of Manitoba from 1969-72, recommended he study at an ashram in the interior of British Columbia. Rabbi Steinberg spent two years there. It was an experience that gave him "a deeper appreciation of the prophets, of Moses and of Abraham," he said.

Rabbi Steinberg, who taught on religious topics at both the University of Manitoba and at the University of North Dakota from 1967-72, went on to serve as the founding rabbi at Winnipeg's Reform Temple Shalom. Afterwards he spent five years in Ottawa in a federal job and in 1977, he moved to Toronto.

With a degree and graduate training in psychology, Rabbi Steinberg is involved in a private psychotherapy practice, where he employs some of the techniques of meditation to help clients resolve issues that are troubling them.

EXPLORING CLASSIC JEWISH TEXTS ON FEMININE SPIRITUALITY

This intellectually challenging, textually based course draws on numerous sources from the Kabbalah and Aggadah to explore the lives of great Jewish women in Biblical times. A completely innovative and provocative understanding of Jewish feminine spirituality emerges from this exploration. Women will gain textual skills in understanding the works of the great Jewish classics as well as insight and perspective in dealing with the daily challenges facing women in modern times. Source material will be provided.

TIME: 8:00-9:00PM
Instructor:
CHANA WEISBERG
Dean of Women's Institute of Advanced Torah Study, Author & Lecturer

TALMUD

This course is designed to introduce participants to one of the most basic sources of Jewish knowledge and scholarship. Opening lessons will provide a background and overview of the Talmud's formation and the unique role it has played in the development of Jewish law and philosophy. Subsequent lessons will focus on the Talmud's mechanism of analysis and elucidation. This series will provide the opportunity for "hands on" experience via the textual study of the Talmud itself. The third chapter of tractate Bava Metzia will be studied.

Jewish students maintain voice at U of T's suburban campus

By ELIZABETH SUMMERFIELD
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Marcel Cohen is pleased when he hears that the Jewish Student's Council (JSC) is still active today, with about 40 members at the University of Toronto's Scarborough campus.

Cohen co-founded the campus group along with Michael Lambert in 1987 when the most urgent needs of Jewish students on that campus were to combat an anti-Israel campaign. In those early days of the intifada, Cohen says, the Arab group on campus was not only a strong presence, it also promoted its beliefs in a particularly unrelenting manner.

"The campus exploded with anti-Israel propaganda, which became anti-Jewish propaganda. And, in response to that, we tried to start a club and we eventually did. The goal was to put a human face on Jews, because there was all this dehumanizing and demonizing of Jews and of Israel," explained Cohen.

The pressures he was feeling as a Jew on this campus were the catalyst for his next step.

"It put me in a quandary," he commented. Cohen thought that maybe the situation would change on its own, but he said this did not happen. He added that no funds were available from the downtown University of Toronto's Jewish Student Union, although the staff were sympathetic to his cause.

Marcel Cohen

Cohen and Lambert ultimately made contact with a well-known community member, Sam Goldstein, whose asssistance eventually led to the formation of an active Jewish Students' Council at Toronto's smaller campuses: Ryerson, Glendon, Seneca, and Scarborough.

During the Gulf War, problems again arose for the Jewish students on the Scarborough campus. Fortunately, they received outside support for their campus Israel Day that spring. Among those who came out were five members of the Jewish Students' Network (a national movement of Jewish students), including then national chair, Joey Felsen, and members of the Jewish Defence League.

"They cared enough to show up. It was an act of solidarity amongst Jews across the city."

Today, things are different. Ilan Lenga, the JSC's current president, said that when he hears Cohen discuss the early days at Scarborough, he feels indebted. Lenga explained that the present executive consists of eight friends, who all chose to attend the Scarborough campus because it is small enough to have a personal touch, with people knowing each other's name.

As Jews, they feel somewhat isolated, but rely on each other's support. JSC member Ari Robiscek was concerned that he would be the only one wearing a kippah on campus and worried about possible anti-Semitism. Lenga thought he would arrive and only have the two other Jews he knew of on campus as his support group. Riva Shapero, another member, finds that the large multicultural society on campus contributes to a better understanding of diversity. These students formed this year's JSC executive after meeting on campus.

The group meets weekly on Thursdays from noon to 2 p.m. in S357 (the portable) primarily for social activities. They have had a number of speakers including Rabbi Benjie Jacoby of Ohr Somayach and Mark Rubinstein of the Israel Youth Program Centre.

Is the grass really greener in Divorceland?

The latest reports suggest that 28% of Canadian married couples get divorced, compared to about 48% in the United States (Toronto Star, January 12, 1994). Perhaps we're more of a traditional or conservative society, less confrontational. Or we're a nation of wimps willing to sacrifice everything for appearances. In Britain, however, a poll of women suggests that 25% thought it more likely they would rather get divorced than work to improve a marriage.

On the other hand, the lax attitudes in Western countries make it easier to obtain a divorce. Increasingly, divorce is regarded as morally acceptable and normal. In Canada, after one year of separation one can normally obtain a divorce without having to give the court any reason. (One of the few exceptions occurs if the applicant is in arrears of support or if no support has yet been ordered or agreed upon. If the applicant appears to be legally obligated to pay alimony or child support and nothing has yet been agreed upon or Court ordered, Judges are often reluctant to grant such a person a divorce).

Easy divorces ... hard consequences

What exactly is wrong with this newfound freedom in the divorce business? An old Joni Mitchell tune hints at the answer: "Don't it always seem to go, that you don't know what you've got 'til it's gone?" The song, years ahead of its time in its treatment of ecological and environmental issues, also recalls the axiom that two can still live more comfortably than one.

In the broad sense, the mindset of "the grass is greener on the other side" is pitfall-ridden. When we reach the other side we seek so ardently (in this case, a state of "divorced bliss"), the grass isn't necessarily greener. It often yellows so quickly that we wonder how our mind ever painted it green.

"Central" issues

In the specific sense, a man who is used to an upper middle-class standard of living is often trapped into continuing prohibitive mortgage payments, while paying for that new rented apartment big enough for access visits, not to mention the cost of the monthly support payment. His ability to spend is dwarfed by having to pay for two households or one and one-half households. The cost of funding the continuing circus of access weekends revolves around what I call a "central" issue to parents who only have access to their children on weekends and must pay for the entertainment: Science Centre, Centre Island, etc.). Meanwhile the parent left behind with the children (usually, but not always, Mom) is even worse off.

Even though they may receive support, divorced women statistically have less money than men after accounting for all the expenses and taxes they must pay. Usually, it is the wife who took time out of the work forced to raise the children, so she's often earning less than her husband, or has been derailed from her career path. If the supporting spouse then fails to meet his Court-ordered support obligations, Mom's situation goes from eating out once a month to never.

Recession to the rescue

Is it any wonder, then, that during the recession many couples chose to stick together rather than opt for the ultimate luxury: a divorce that neither could afford even if they never had to pay a cent in legal fees. Of course, if the divorcing couple litigates their problems in the Courts, then either or both spouses often lose much of their assets or income in their quest to drive the other spouse into bankruptcy.

Some might think that perhaps it was a simpler world when the divorce rate was lower and spouses (usually women) "stuck it out."

On the outside that world may have appeared simpler. But what about all the women who suffered through unbearable marriages, silently scarred by years of physical or emotional abuse? Was it simpler for them? Did they deserve to pay such a terrible price for keeping the family together emotionally and financially? To be sure, families must work hard to stay together, and get help, but if the marriage is truly damaging then there comes a point where enough is enough.

Haste makes waste

Perhaps some problems can be solved before resorting to the ultimate remedy. Sometimes we are too quick to leave, particularly in a young marriage when in-laws interfere. But that's another kettle of fish, the cooking of which would fill up this newspaper and then some.

Peace agreement threatens Jewish security: Sharon

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The September peace accord between Israel and the PLO was "a major mistake," and threatens Jewish security around the world, Gen. Ariel Sharon told a synagogue audience here last week.

"No one has to preach peace to us. You do sign an agreement with enemies, but not with murderers. [PLO Chairman Yasser] Arafat has more Jewish blood on his hands than anyone since the Nazis," the hawkish Sharon, a former Israeli defence and housing minister, told a receptive crowd of 2,000 at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Rather than bury Arafat, Sharon was in town to praise the 140,000 Jews who live in 144 settlements of Judea, Samaria and Gaza, some areas of which, according to the accord, are scheduled to come under eventual Palestinian self-rule.

In an impassioned speech, Sharon said he wasn't asking but "demanding" the Diaspora come to the settlers' aid.

"It's not that we [Israel] are defending the settlers; the settlers are defending us," Sharon said to wide applause. "Without this wonderful group of people, Israel would have been forced to return to its pre-1967 boundaries. They are the soldiers who are holding our frontier. They are the last vanguard against a Palestinian state."

Sharon, a hero of the 1973 Yom Kippur War and who led Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, quoted Abba Eban, the Israeli liberal intellectual, in calling Israel's narrow pre-'67 frontier "the Auschwitz border."

Israel "is not just a Jewish project. It's a worldwide project. We should remember every day what it was like before 1948."

Sharon's 10-city, 10-day blitz of North American cities, which kicked off here, is designed to rally Jewish opinion against the accord and raise funds for the settlers. His visit was sponsored by Canadian Friends of Yesha, which has embarked on an aggressive fundraising drive for the Yesha Council, a committee representing the Jewish communities of the West Bank and Gaza.

Yesha is a Hebrew acronym for Judea, Samaria and Gaza but also means redemption.

His long military career taught Sharon "never to leave behind a wounded soldier. [The settlers] are being left behind" by Israel's Labor government, which has "discriminated" against them and "made their lives harder.

"Who would have thought that Jews on the frontline would have to buy their own ambulances?" asked Sharon, referring to one of the settlers' most pressing needs.

He called the accord with the PLO "a moral mistake," one that has "heightened" dangers and threatens to "weaken" Jews everywhere.

"The government did not sign an accord with the Palestinian people. It signed an accord with one terrorist organization — the PLO — out of 15 terrorist organizations."

He said the government of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin is trying to make areas of Israel "Judenrein" (cleansed of Jews, a term the Nazis used). And what happens in Israel "will affect your lives," he warned.

Sharon said he would not have left Israel for a speaking tour if he did not regard the current situation as "urgent."

Just prior to the address, Yakov Katz, Sharon's one-time deputy at the Housing Ministry and a co-founder of the Gush Emunim movement, read aloud the names of the 24 Israelis killed in terrorist incidents since the accord was signed in Washington.

Sharon was introduced by Yehiel Leiter, director of the Yesha Council's foreign desk, who in his own thunderous address, pledged that "nothing, nothing will drive [the settlers] out."

* * *

In an earlier interview with The CJN, Leiter said what the settlers "are really interested in is not for the government to say 'We have sinned,' but to halt the process.

"The government has embarked on a strip-tease act. Everything is off. Now all it has to do, if it wills it, is to see that the PLO has abrogated the agreement by continuing to engage in terror and by not condemning it by others. We're interested in deeds."

Despite its right-ward leanings, the Yesha Council is "apolitical" and advocates non-violent civil disobedience, said Leiter, himself a resident of Eli, a settlement established in 1984 near Nablus.

With polls showing a majority of Israelis now opposes the peace plan and only 35 per cent approve of the Labor government, Yesha's test is "to see whether we can galvanize that latent disapproval into public action." Leiter points proudly to the 67 demonstrations which followed the recent stabbing deaths of two Bnei Brak residents.

Leiter charges the government with moving "way beyond its mandate. It's going too fast, too undemocratically."

The coming months will see a dramatic upsurge in terrorist incidents against settlers, he fears, but at the same time, there has been an equally dramatic increase in the amount of money the council has received from abroad, he noted.

The funds are needed because establishment charities like the United Jwish Appeal are "boycotting" the settlements, he said.

"I do not say people shouldn't give to UJA. G-d bless the UJA. But each Jew has to find a way around this boycott."

The settlers' most immediate needs include ambulances, schools and social services, he said.

Leiter recognizes that in an almost perversely ironic way, the settlements may come out of this crisis financially ahead of where they were before September.

BBYO BOWLING

BBYO recently formed a new chapter with Jewish Russian teenagers. At the first program in October, the youth participated in an afternoon of tie dying of BBYO t-shirts. The youth then attended the BBYO member training day where they learned the basics of the organization. In December a Chanukah bowling party was held. Gymnastics coach imports know-how from native land

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Alex Bard arrived in Canada in 1977, he was amazed to see the modest level of coaching young gymnasts were receiving.

Often, he would find that parents who brought their children to gymnastics clubs would also double as their coach — and this after having taken only a single six-hour, qualifying course.

Back in his native Kiev, things were a lot different. Gymnastics was one of the country's prestige sports, and developing championship calibre athletes was almost a national priority.

Gymnastics programs were set up in a professional manner and athletes were scouted at a very young age. The very best were developed for elite competition.

Bard says he has brought some of that Soviet gymnastics know-how to his job as head coach of Gymnastics Mississauga (GM), one of Canada's premier clubs. The result has been the creation of a virtual factory for the development of champion gymnasts. Fully half the women's national team — six seniors and four juniors — train at GM. Most well known is Stella Umeh, for two years Canada's national women's champ.

Her 15th place finish at the 1992 Barcelona Olympics was the highest ever for a Canadian gymnast, said Bard, who doubles as high performance coach for the Canadian national team.

At the '92 world championships, held just prior to the Olympics, Umeh finished fifth in beam and sixth in vault. No other Canadian woman had ever placed in the top 10, he noted.

Another product of GM's elite program is Jeanet Morin, who also competed for Canada at the Barcelona Games. At the 1988 Olympics, GM member Janine Rankin represented Canada, while in 1984, it was Andrea Owoc.

Bard said one of the reasons for the club's success is the higher level of coaching he has introduced. Where once many of the coaches were volunteers, today 99 percent are ex-athletes, many from the former Soviet Union. From their experience as competitors on the international stage, they have learned elite-level techniques and how to prepare for championship meets. They are able to pass on these skills to novice gymnasts, he said.

Beyond that has been the phenomenal growth in popularity of the sport itself. More than 8,000 fans gathered recently at Maple Leaf Gardens to view an international competition that featured Vitaly Scherbo of Belarus, winner of six individual and team gold medals at Barcelona.

GM has benefitted from this grassroots explosion of popularity. In 1977, only 175 kids were members of GM, whereas today there are more than 2,600, making it the largest gymnastics club in Canada.

"We can compete now on the same level as the best in the world," Bard says with no small measure of pride. At the 1993 world championship finals, two Canadians, Umeh and Stacey Galloway, made it to the finals, competing against top athletes from Romania, Russia and Ukraine.

One young athlete that Bard is very high on is 11-year-old Moshe Roy Asaria of Mississauga. "He's potentially the most talented guy in our club and he has the most potential in Canada," Bard said. While there are no guarantees in gymnastics, Bard believes that if Asaria continues to work hard and show the dedication that is required, he can represent Canada nationally.

"He has the perfect body type. He's small, strong like a bull and well co-ordinated," Bard said.

For his part, Azaria has already set his sights quite high. Ultimately, he wants to represent Canada at the Olympics, but in the meantime, he's gearing up for a qualifying meet in Burlington on Jan. 30 for the national team at the Tyro level for 12- and 13-year-olds.

He's also hoping to participate in the Maccabi youth games in two years, as is Bard, who'd like to serve as coach.

In the meantime, Asaria continues a gruelling schedule that sees him at the club five days a week for four hours at a time, training primarily under coach Doron Kernerman.

While his friends sometimes tease him by calling gymnastics a "sissy sport," Asaria deflects the jibes. "I tell them it's a good sports for boys and girls," he says.

Weizmann honors Koffler

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a year of celebration for the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science and to kick it off they held a gala dinner (not a fundraiser), complete with orchestra and even bagpipes. Over 400 people gathered at the Inn on the Park Hotel to pay tribute to Murray Koffler, immediate past chair of Weizmann's international board of governors, on his 70th birthday, and to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the Canadian Society as well as the 60th anniversary of the institute itself.

The dinner was preceded by a joint national and Toronto chapter annual meeting during which Weizmann president Haim Harari assured attendees that "the state of the institution is excellent. Our financial situation is adequate, which means not to worry, but does not mean, 'Stop giving'."

Harari is credited with having turned around the institute's financial situation during the first four years of his tenure, creating a balanced budget from a $32 million debt. Last year he agreed to serve a second five-year term as president of the prestigious Rehovot-based institution.

Thomas Beck, who was re-elected as national chairman of the board and president of the Canadian Society, noted that in 1992 the Canadian Society surpassed its obligation to the university.

Also re-elected were Allan Gordon as Toronto chapter president and David Dennis as Toronto chairman of the board. Leslie Dan was elected to the international board of governors, and James Kay was elected a deputy chair of the international board.

Murray Koffler

Gordon, among others, spoke of the collaboration existing between Weizmann scientists in Rehovot and their Canadian counterparts.

Among the Canadian Society's contributions to the institute are The Canadian Centre for Nuclear Physics with its Koffler Accelerator Tower.

Leif Loberg, a University of Toronto student who attended Weizmann's Bessie F. Lawrence Summer Science Institute, a program for graduating high school students, spoke of the positive impact the experience had on him academically and otherwise.

"In the past 60 years the Weizmann Institute has become one of the crown jewels of 20th-century civilization," said New York-based Gershon Kekst, who succeeded Koffler as chair of Weizmann's international board of governors.

The Weizmann Institute exists as part of two "circles," explained Harari at the dinner. It is part of the State of Israel, to which it contributes in areas such as industry, medical systems and defence; and part of the international world of science, as evidenced by the relatively high percentage (one-third) of Weizmann publications co-authored by scientists from other countries.

"A third circle is emerging," said Harari. "That's the circle of the Middle East." He expressed the hope that Weizmann will have Arab scientists from neighboring countries, adding that there are already Muslim scientists at the university.

Harari, Kekst and several other speakers paid tribute to Koffler for his contributions to Weizmann and other institutions and causes. The founding president of the Canadian Society, Koffler, who is the founder of Shoppers Drug Mart, has also established such organizations as the Council on Drug Abuse and the Canadian Council for Native Business.

"It's your energy, vitality and love for life that's been your prescription for happiness," said Koffler's daughter Theo Koffler Stern. Koffler Stern also paid tribute to her mother Marvelle, founder of Weizmann Women for Science, who is being honored in her own right at an upcoming Weizmann dinner to be held in June.

"What Murray teaches us," said Kekst, "is that one person can make a monumental difference."

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld of Temple Emanu-El said the motzi and offered a brief prayer to inspire others to learn from Koffler's example of community service and love of life.

A video prepared for the occasion included a tribute from former Canadian prime minister Pierre Trudeau. Israeli president Ezer Weizman and his predecessors Chaim Herzog and Efraim Katzir sent congratulatory letters.

Flacks recalls grandmother in her show

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of Diane Flacks' most ardent fans is her 90-year-old great-grandmother, Helen Litovitz, a resident of Baycrest Centre.

Though the dailies and magazines in Toronto have featured this talented actor many times, it is only when an item about her appears in The CJN, that Flacks will get a congratulatory call from her great-grandmother.

This pleases her very much for Flacks identifies closely with her Jewish roots--a trademark of her acerbic, bitter-sweet comic style is her faithful reproduction of the accents of the Jewish older generation.("I could be dead for three days and nobody would notice.")

Her one-woman show By a Thread runs at Tarragon Theatre Extra Space (30 Bridgman Ave., 531-1827) Jan. 20 to Feb. 20, and Flacks says her parents, Cy and Lily, her brother, Daniel, a computer software designer, and her younger sister, Laura, (about to leave for Israel) will be there in force on opening night, as they always are.

A graduate of the Jewish school system in Toronto (Associated and CHAT), she is delighted at the response of non-Jewish audiences to the Jewish characters in her monologues who are usually as familiar as the people sitting next to you. Not that she has only Jewish material. Her appeal is that she seeks out the incongruities we all see, whether in young or old, Jewish or non-Jewish, but can't give them the voice she does.

At age 28, this tiny 5' 3"performer (who looks much taller on stage) and who graduated from York University's theatre program in 1988, is a real pro, but she still has the shakes before opening a one-woman show."I feel as if my spleen is going to burst. But once I get underway and hear and see the audience I'm alright."

In By a Thread Flacks plays Rosie "an avoidance artist" who has creative ways of putting off what has to be done, and equally creative ways of justifying her procrastination.

When she left York University, jobs in the theatre were hard to get, so Flacks and two other women formed Empress Productions and one of their shows I'd Kiss You, But... brought her favorable notices. Though she didn't want to do it, (her two associates had gone separate ways), she was convinced to try her hand at writing and performing a one-woman show,*Myth Me*as part of one of Toronto's summer fringe festivals, and it was a big hit.

The new production of By a Thread is a remount of the show she presented a year ago at The Poor Alex Theatre. Later this year Flacks will reprise her role at the Tarragon in Theory of Relatives to which she made such a signal contribution, both in performance and content.

On top of all this, she is one of the writers of the popular CBC TV program Kids in the Hall.

Diane Flacks

Correction

The late community activist and clothing retailer Nathan Gold left three daughters. An obituary in last week's CJN provided incorrect information. The CJN regrets an pain this may have caused the family.

As well, the name of the cantor at Beit Rayim Synagogue in Richmond Hill is Marden Paul.

CAMPS

SHAPING UP AT SUMMER CAMP

The exhibition, A Worthy Use of Summer: Jewish Summer Camping in America, at the Philadelphia National Museum of American Jewish History examined the role of Jewish summer camps in shaping the religious identity of American Jewish youth. "This is important because even though camping has been critical to the development of American Jewish identity, the subject is largely unexplored," said Margo Bloom, director of the museum. This picture from the exhibit that ran until early December, shows a combined baseball and Hebrew lesson at a Massad Hebrew Camp ca. 1950's.

Fun for all at the Hillcrest Day Camp

Centrally located in the beautiful, green Hoggs Hollow Valley at Yonge and York Mills. Our unique camp caters solely to the preschool set ages 2½ to 5 years.

We provide an enriched, creative and nurturing environment while maintaining the highest safety standards.

A low camper/counsellor ratio helps to ensure each child is made to feel comfortable and secure in what is often their first camp experience. Our staff is comprised of Hillcrest teachers, student teachers from the Early Childhood Education Program and mature, experienced counsellors.

The rolling camp grounds and the adventure type playground provide a setting for exploration and fun. Our trained Red Cross swim staff are sensitive to new and experienced swimmers, providing your child with a feeling of security and confidence in the water.

In our arts and crafts program your child's imagination will blossom with our creative and stimulating "hands-on" experience.

Music is one of the highlights at Hillcrest Day Camp. The music program is directed by our music specialist, Kayla.

Hillcrest Summer Camp provides a safe and secure environment geared to the needs of your preschoolers.

Camp Ramah is set to inspire today's youth

Camp Ramah, located on Skeleton Lake in Muskoka offers a quality camping program in the framework of traditional Jewish practice. Under the directorship of Rabbi Mitch Cohen, Ramah offers a wide range of activities to children ages 9-16 finishing grades 3-10.

Ramah offers a full range of activities for campers. Our exciting water front activities are provided by certified staff and our safe and exciting program is a highlight for our campers. Daily basic and advanced instruction are offered in water skiing, sailing, swimming, tripping, windsurfing, canoeing and kayaking. Sports is an integral part of every campers development, focusing on skills, teamwork, and sportsmanship. Arts activities allow each camper to realize their creative potential through projects, performances, and individualized instruction. Outdoors programs take full advantage of the camp's beautiful setting while raising our camper's environmental awareness, appreciation of nature, and camping and scouting skills.

Judaica part of camp day

Judaica is a regular part of the camp day. Hebrew language and Jewish texts are taught by young adults in an informal setting. Hebrew is spoken, heard and learned at camp. For most campers comprehension of Hebrew becomes second nature. Shabbat, prayer, and ritual observance assumes a new dimension when they are experienced in a setting of natural beauty and shared creatively with friends. Israel becomes closer to our campers through music, dance, and personal contacts with Israeli staff.

Unique program

Tikvah means "hope." Ramah now offers a unique one month program for campers with special needs. The Tikvah program gives adolescents ages 12-17 an opportunity to enjoy all of the camp activities and also explore their own Jewish indentity in the Ramah environment. Additionally, Ramah offers Family Camp at the end of August; Taste of Ramah, a one week session for children in Grade 2; and annual Lawyers and Alumni Days. Israel programs are also available for high school students.

Staff are often former campers who return to Ramah because of the deep-rooted commitment to Ramah. Young people develop skills and leadership, enduring friendships and a Jewish consciousness that helps them become vibrant members of their family and home community.

In the words of one Ramah parent, "Thank you for allowing my child to find her own individuality as well as the part of a lively Jewish community."

Camp Shalom

Camp Shalom has established its reputation for the past 46 years as a vibrant, tightly knit summer camp with a warm community atmosphere. Friendships made at Camp Shalom last a lifetime.

Over the years generations of campers have enjoyed Camp Shalom's well-rounded program, which offers strong Jewish content.

"As a Zionist camp, most of our program is related to Israel, Jewish history and Jewish culture," says Steve Gillick, presently in his third year as Camp Director.

"We have a Camp Shalom Shabbat followed by an evening of drama presentations, Israeli singing and dancing. The campers always remember the Shabbat."

Set in Gravenhurst on Lake Muskoka, Shalom is less than two hours north of Toronto. The camp gives young people, ages 8 to 13 the opportunity to participate in more than 17 different activities during the day.

The program includes a ropes course with a zip line, canoe tripping. camping trips and baseball. Also available are self-defence, water skiing, canoeing, sailing, instructional swim, tennis, gymnastics, scouting, cooking and lots more!

Campers can also indulge in various arts activities, among them a well established drama program, newspaper and arts and crafts. At Shalom, Campers have a say in which activities they would like to participate.

Steve Gillick says that from day one, "we speak about Hargashat Bayit, a feeling for the home. We talk about creating an atmosphere at camp that includes mutual respect, fair play, learning to get along, sharing ideals, and sharing fun and laughter."

At three-to-one, the staff to camper ratio at Shalom is high.

Gillick says that one of the strengths of the camp is that many of the staff come out of the Young Judaea camp movement and were once campers themselves.

"They learn hadracha (leadership) and programming skills in the movement and bring this knowledge to Shalom."

Nineteen ninety-four will also mark the inauguration of the Camp Shalom 10 day "Sneak Preview" program. This program is available to 8 and 9 year olds and will allow them to get a taste of what it is like to attend overnight camp. Campers will be allowed to sign up for the remaining 17 days of the session if they choose.

Gillick says that the 1994 season "will knock the campers socks off" with exciting new evening programs, camp-wide evening programs, special waterfront activities and, for the campers staying the full season, there will be totally different programs in each of the four week sessions. "We have a lot of surprises in store," Gillick maintained "but we don't want to let the cat out of the bag yet."

The camp offers kosher food, supervised by the Kashrut Council, Federation of Greater Toronto. Campers live in cabins with electricity and washrooms. Generally, there are 10 campers per cabin along with three live-in staff.

Shalom is an accredited member of the Ontario Camping Association.

There are still spaces available in August (July 29-Aug. 24) for all age groups as well as the Sneak Preview Program. For more information, please call Steve or Helene at Camp Shalom at (416) 783-6744.

What a combo - English riding and tennis

For over twelve years The Hollows Camp has offered a quality riding program to a great many committed young riders. With only 42 children per session, both novice and experienced riders can excel through the individually planned lesson programs tailored to each student.

This year The Hollows Camp is offering a new program in recreational tennis along with their traditional sports and arts activities. "There are many aspects to a summer camp experience both social and experimental," says Stephen Fine, who along with his wife Janet are the owner/directors of the camp.

"While riding is the main reason that determines one's choice for attending The Hollows Camp, we believe that a well-rounded activity program is the best way to approach any sports discipline in a summer camp environment."

"It is not unusual when parents come to tour our facilities, that they often ask if they can register for camp themselves," adds Janet Fine. "We encourage all prospective campers and their families to take advantage of a personal tour before making a final decision." Come and see for yourself what makes The Hollows Camp such a special place for so many. Contact Janet or Stephen Fine at (905) 775-2694.

Quality Name Tapes

Tired of sewing on name tapes for camp or school? Consider this fabulous product: iron-on labels that are extremely durable and withstand vigorous washings.

In 1992, Judy Engel and Judi Alter were frustrated with the standard iron-on labels which would always fall off and were too small. The result — the children would lose their clothing. This unnecessary expense prompted Engel and Alter to find quality iron-on Name Tapes.

These labels are used in nursing homes and other institutions. The actual size of the label is double the size of other products on the market and the print is large. Even your children can read their own names!

The name tapes are held on with industrial strength glue, resistant both to washing and heavy wear and tear. Once on, they stay on! All it takes is 15 seconds on the hottest setting of your iron.

Through direct marketing and a flyer mailed with a sample of their name tape, the response was incredible, especially from camps. They are now expanding into stores that sell camp clothing, such as Chocky's, Over The Rainbow and Rock A Bye Baby. One hundred labels are $14.95, including taxes, plus $2 shipping and handling; 200 labels are $27.95 including taxes, plus $2 shipping and handling. Anyone who responds to this offer before April 1st, will receive an additional 25 Name Tapes for free.

Camp builds friendships

Camp Shomria offers a dynamic and exciting summer experience for campers aged 8-16 from Canada and the United States. The program offers a unique variety of both fun and challenging sport, educational and cultural activities in an atmosphere which helps to build life long friendships.

Camp Shomria promotes a strong understanding and love for Israel and the North American Jewish community. It is run by the Hashomer Hatzair Youth Movement, an organization that was established over 80 years ago, and is active year-round within the Toronto Jewish community. There is also a 6-day winter camp and weekly activities held throughout the school year.

Camp Shomria offers a wide range of activities and programs, that are enjoyable for everyone (please see directory). Campers who have just completed grade 10 participate in a special program centred around leadership, co-operation and responsibility. The program, called Yedid Plus, includes an intensive five-week program in Israel.

The staff are all dedicated and committed to the camp and the campers, and most have themselves been Shomria campers, and have grown up with Hashomer Hatzair. Camp Shomria has its own full-time registered nurse, and many of the staff members are trained in first aid. An excellent hospital with modern facilities is located just minutes away. To find out more about Camp Shomria, please call Miriam or Tuvia at 736-1339.

Camp B'nai Brith - a camp for the 90s

Camp B'nai B'rith at Pine Lake, Alberta enters its 39th summer of providing quality Jewish camping to North American boys and girls aged 7 through 16. Located on scenic Pine Lake in central Alberta. B'nai B'rith continues to offer a truly unique summer program which includes traditional camp activities, the study of Jewish culture and values through songs, stories and celebrations and an appreciation of the significance of the State of Israel in modern Jewish life.

For '94 the camp has added a mountain biking program: expanded its arts and crafts facilities to include a ceramics studio, tie-dying, silk-screening, batik and sewing; increased the size of its Kibbutz 'mini-farm' to include a wider variety of animals; updated several specialty areas with new equipment, and finally, developed an impressive library of creative and innovative programs for all age groups. New director Jack Feldman is committed to making '94 the best summer in B.B. history!

The camp's facilities include a large swimming pool, Red Cross awards, skiing, sailing, windsurfing, canoeing, mountain biking, riding, tennis, baseball, soccer, landsports, Maccabiah, arts and crafts, ceramics, Kibbutz 'mini-farm,' Oneg Shabbat Services, Israeli Song and Dance and special camp-wide programs and events. There are also optional hiking trips to the Rocky Mountains, and a five day canoe adventure down the Red Deer River.

Full Season — July 6th-Aug. 17th. July Half-season — July 6th-July 27th. August Half-season — July 27th-Aug. 17th.

New facilities unveiled

As soon as the buses turn down the camp road, campers naturally become very excited. The long, winter wait is over; camp is about to begin.

Last summer, the level of excitement was greater than ever as the campers began to see the new facilities at Camp Northland-B'nai Brith. They enthused over the four green and red, state-of-the-art tennis courts. They marvelled at seeing three full-size basketball courts with four extra hoops for practising. They were amazed by the floor hockey pad, complete with boards to bounce shots off. And nestled in the woods they saw the Pavilion, a large, well-ventilated recreation centre which could be used for a whole myriad of indoor programs.

All the regular programs were still there for the campers to enjoy. Located on 750 picturesque acres in the Haliburton Highlands, Camp Northland-B'nai Brith offers privacy and space for campers to hike in the woods and explore the wonders of nature; to enjoy the crystal-clear waters of Moose Lake while paddling in a canoe, sailing, windsurfing, swimming, or fishing. A new waterski boat added the experience of biscuiting or kneeboarding to the already popular ski program. A covered outdoor deck expanded the arts and crafts centre to allow the creative camper to work either indoors or out. With two fully equipped baseball diamonds, soccer fields, volleyball and tetherball courts, there are facilities to suit every child's interest.

It is no wonder that parents ask to stay at camp after visiting day!

Fun lakefront day camp

Camp Arrowhead, a lakefront day camp that has been serving cottage communities on Lake Simcoe for 37 years is thrilled to announce that for the first time this year, busing will be offered from Thornhill and Richmond Hill.

Campers age 3-15 from these areas can now take advantage of all the water activities including canoeing, kayaking, sailing and waterskiing, traditionally offered only at overnight camps.

As well as the water activities that are supervised and taught by qualified staff, Camp Arrowhead also offers a multitude of land sports, tennis instruction, arts and crafts, ceramics, drama and music. Add to that the overnights, special theme days and the new Adventure Program and campers are all set for a fantastic fun-filled summer.

The counsellors, under the direction of Molly Maguire and Ric Gunton, are experienced and enthusiastic, and as a result of the low counsellor/camper ratios, every camper gets the attention they need.

CAMP ARROWHEAD LAKE SIMCOE

Marky's Warehouse Outlet -summer camp headquarters

Marky's Warehouse Outlet has been in business for two years. Their major stock in trade is camp clothing and other camp gear from boots to water bottles. They have a full range of clothes, including socks, underwear, T-shirts, sweatshirts, shorts and splash pants. They also carry hardware, as well as personal care items such as toothbrushes.

Partner Peter Riley calls Marky's "the one-stop camp shop," which can outfit the widest possible range of ages from children to adults. In the Warehouse Outlet's 7,500 square feet, parents and campers can find everything on the required equipment lists of summer camps, both day and sleep-over, in the Toronto area.

One of Marky's features is the traditional one-piece or two-piece camp pajama. For a small extra charge, a print may be heat-sealed on to the pajama; there are over 200 prints to choose from. Heat-sealed lettering is also available. Iron-on or sew-on name tags can be ordered; laundry markers are available for those who prefer to write their own names.

Team logos

Marky's carries plenty of clothing with team logos: Jays, Leafs & College teams. Their licensed products include a Looney Tunes section with an entire range of garments and all the characters. In addition, for both children and adults, there is a large denim section in blue and other colors; this section offers not only jeans, but also jackets, shirts and overalls. Brand names include Lee Cooper, Jonathan G and Red Star.

For cooler nights at camp, Marky's carries several lines of fleece-lined underwear and other warm clothing for all ages and sizes. Tops can be had with or without hoods. Among the brand names available are Hanes, Gym Master and Fruit of the Loom. There is also an extensive selection of men's and ladies' underwear by Jockey & Fruit of the Loom.

Customer convenience

Marky's offers a full line of plaid clothing: boxer shorts, short- and long-sleeved shirts with or without hoods, and bagger pants. Another specialty of the store is the Guatemalan look in shorts, pants and tops. There are money pouches, bracelets, scrunchies and hacky sacks as well. As a sideline, Marky's sells a wide range of sports videotapes.

For parents who bring their children, there is a play centre with toys and a slide. There is a self-service counter where hot coffee and cookies are always available. A TV and VCR are continuously in operation, playing sports tapes. For the convenience of customers making many purchases, there is no restriction on the number of items which may be taken into the fitting rooms.

Marky's is located at 7171 Yonge St. on the east side, in the same plaza as Hy & Zel's Supermarket. There is ample parking. Visa, MasterCard and American Express are accepted; so are personal cheques. Full refund policy in effect if not 100% satisfied.

Camp New Moon teaches life skills

For Al Goodman and his son Jack, camp is not just a profession but it is a way of life. Al started his career as a counsellor at age 16 and continued to work at many camps through his High School, University and Teaching career. While teaching at Forest Hill Junior High where he was Head of Physical & Health Education for 15 years, he purchased Camp New Moon.

Camp was an instant success and this year marks their 35th season.

Jack has followed in Al's footsteps. Having graduated from Phys. Ed. He continued on to receive his Ph. D. and now he and Al share the Co-Directors duties of the camp.

Intimate atmosphere

Al and Jack feel the most valuable aspect of their camp is the very warm intimate atmosphere that exists due to its smaller size. In spite of pressure of these past years to expand they have kept its numbers small. As a result every child receives individual attention and almost unlimited used of the facilities which are as numerous as most camps having double the number of campers. It is commonplace for campers to be able to sail or waterski or play tennis everyday if they wish.

This aspect comes into play particularly in the Junior Camp. Cabin groups age 7 to 10 are kept to a maximum of 8 children, each supervised by two to three counsellors. They have introduced shorter period of stay from 10 days to two weeks which allow first time campers an easier adjustment to being away from home.

Encourage participation

The general philosophy is to encourage as wide a participation as possible in order to develop skills that will be valuable in later life. In this regard the activities are a means to an end — to develop in everyone a sense of self-worth-mutual respect and consideration of others.

Those with special talents are encouraged to enhance them, and those who have limited talents are helped to find latent abilities and persue them.

The majority of campers are from Jewish homes and Friday night is special. Shabbat dinner followed by services prepared by the campers and the evening is completed with an all camp sing-song and camp fire. The atmosphere at this time embodies the very warm family feeling that permeates the camp for the rest of the week.

Camp Connection

When shopping for camp at Camp Connection, parents are assured of high quality, durable merchandise at the lowest prices around.

So sure is owner Bryan Gerber of his low prices that he guarantees his customers that he will match any price. "I'm confident however, that no one will find lower prices for identical items anywhere. We beat our competition hands-down. Brand name items such as Keds running shoes and Jockey underwear are even cheaper at Camp Connection than they are in stores in the United States. "We've gone nuts slashing prices."

Not only are prices low, and service great, but the store is chock-full of merchandise — a one-stop camping store. In addition to such items as flannel shorts and pants, leggings, jeans, T-shirts and sweatshirts from kids size 4 to adult X-large, campers can get all the equipment they require, from sleeping bags and blankets to flashlights, pens, canteens, soap and toothbrushholders. "We even sell more Coppertone sunblock than anyone else because we sell it for less money. When we say our prices are good, we're not fooling around," says Gerber.

Lowest prices, best selection

Camp Connection staff, all campers and former campers, pride themselves on selling customers only what they need. "We sell sleeping bags at various prices, but we will tell the parents if a lower-priced bag will serve the same purpose as one that costs a little more. We also sell four different flashlights, but why pay more if you can buy a flashlight that will work just as well. We like to sell the basics. We do carry better merchandise, but we sell customers only what they need," Gerber stresses.

No misleading advertising

Shopping at Camp Connection is fun and stress-free. Staff is always willing to show parents around, suggesting what items their kids will need, and the little kids can enjoy some juice and play in the play area while their parents shop. "We often have kids come in the store who just do not want to leave. We not only help keep camp expenses down, we help keep shopping stress down. Parents come into our store knowing they are getting good prices, good merchandise, good variety and good service." says Gerber.

He says that the store is now being stocked for the coming camp season and suggests that customers shop early for the best possible selection. "The prices will not change. Someone can walk into the store today and again in two months and the prices will be indentical, but the selection may not be as complete."

Creative computer camp for all levels

Young Einsteins presents an exciting opportunity for children to learn computer skills during the summer and get a head start on the school year.

Our computer camp will be held Monday to Friday, in the morning or afternoon, The camp begins by introducing important computer concepts and the basics of computing. From there, children move into various software applications including word processing, computer art, desktop publishing, charts, graphs and communications.

We also have a large stock of educational software to help children develop their basic knowledge in reading, writing, mathematics and logical reasoning.

At Young Einsteins, we believe that education can and should be fun.

A fun environment leads to increased concentration and a genuine enthusiasm for learning that stays with children for the rest of their lives.

We offer computer classes at all levels, for children starting as young as 3! Our class sizes are small, so each child receives individual attention. At Young Einsteins, we remove the mystique surrounding the computer.

Young Einsteins INC.

NOW, YOUR FAMILY CAN GROW WITH TECHNOLOGY . . . NOT BEHIND IT.

$E_{education} = m_{ind} c_{computer}^{2}$

At Young Einsteins we meet the challenges of the computer by providing training for the entire family. From preschoolers to seniors, we unlock the mystery of the computer and make the learning process FUN.

Green Diamond Baseball Camp is a hit

Entering its eighth season of operation, Green diamond is a baseball camp which operates for eight weeks in the summer. The camp offers a progressive program such that campers may come for two, four, six or even eight weeks. They can choose a full day of baseball, or divide the day equally between baseball and other counsellor-supervised programs such as arts crafts, field hockey and miniature golf. Every day there is a recreational swim, or an optional instuctional swim.

Green Diamond is for children aged 5 to fourteen and serves 500 children each session. The baseball program is structured such that the fundamentals are stressed through hands-on individual instruction in each position. As a result of this, every child has the opportunity to develop their baseball skills according to individual ability, need and desire.

Rookie camp, for beginners aged five and six, consists of half a day of baseball and half a day of other activities, with one instructor for every five campers. At the level for children 11-14 years of age, there is a full day of basball and there is one instructor for every ten campers. Instructors must have experience.

"We put the fun in fundamentals," says owner Michael Belz, who believes that instruction and having a good time should go hand in hand. Green Diamond combines the training of a baseball school with the fun of a summer camp.

Cito Gaston, who is now in his fourth year as director of baseball operations, has had a great deal of input in designing the program. There are six diamonds, each of different size, with a home-run fence at a different distance from home plate, so that every child has a chance to hit a home run. There are six batting cages with automatic pitching machines.

A Blue Jay visits the camp during every two-week session. Among those who have appeared are John Olerud, Devon White and Tony Fernandez. There are also specialty weeks. In 1993 there was a pitching week with Ferguson Jenkins, the only Canadian Hall of Famer; and former Blue Jay great Ernie Whitt hosted a hitting camp.

Besides excursions to Blue Jay games, there are out-of-town trips. In 1993 there was a weekend trip to Boston; campers will be visiting Cleveland in 1994, to see the new stadium.

Green Diamond is in the Bruce's Mill Conservation Area, off the Stouffville sideroad east of Highway 404. There is door-to-door busing. To prepare children for longer stays away from home, there are optional one-night sleepovers.

DISCOVER TORONTO DAY CAMP

Discover Toronto Day Camp runs for nine weeks from July 9 to September 2, with registration by the week. The camp is for children from seven to 14; there is a Counsellor-In-Training program for 15-year-olds. Discover Toronto has been operating for eight years.

The campers visit places like Canada's Wonderland, Wild Water Kingdom, Ontario Place and the CNE, and attend events like Blue Jays games; emphasis is on summer fun and the outdoors. Each week offers a different combination of events, each day a visit to a different place.

Each group of eight children has one counsellor and one CIT; staff are mature, responsible and carefully chosen. Children are constantly supervised, yet encouraged to feel free. Discover Toronto's program is what director Harsley Lichtbleu calls "supervised adventure".

Because events are on weekdays during the day, there are no lineups. Not being slowed down by adults, campers and their counsellors can move at a kid's fast pace. At the same time that the children are discovering Toronto, parents have a holiday from their children.

There are two overnight trips during the summer. The first is to Wasaga Beach; the campers spend the first day at the Beach, stay overnight at the Blue Mountain Hotel, and visit the Blue Mountain Slide Rides on the second day. The second trip is to Niagara Falls; the campers visit Marineland on the first day, ride on the Maid of the Mist in the evening, and on the second day visit Maple Leaf Village. These trips prepare children for longer stays away from home.

Groups are formed by age, and according to likes and dislikes. When campers are registered, they fill out a questionnaire about their preferences; "kids," says Harsley, "have a lot of input". Ads for Discover Toronto Day Camp include a calendar which children sometimes tear out of the paper and take to their parents, saying: "I wanna go there!"

The fee is $225 a week, and includes busing and tickets to events. There is supervised area pickup in North York, Richmond Hill, Ajax-Pickering, Scarborough and Mississauga; in Thornhill there is door-to-door pickup. Children are asked to bring a lunch from home. Early registration discounts apply before January 28 and April 1. The phone numbers, which are also fax numbers, are 740-CAMP and 1-800-265-5226. Visa and registration by fax are accepted.

Day camp: "Mid-town jewel"

Crestwood Valley Day Camp, located in a beautiful wooded valley near the intersections of Bayview and Lawrence avenues, brings children ages 3-11 close to nature while providing them with the comforts of home.

"We are fortunate to have such a fabulous site located right in the middle of town," says camp director Rochelle Wise.

Campers are encouraged to explore the valley in which the camp is located. Campers are also introduced to nature through experience on the camp's own miniature farm, which features a vegetable garden and many animals including pigs, ducks, chickens and rabbits. "Our campers enjoy visiting the farm," says Wise. "It is exciting for the younger campers for whom the animals become such special friends."

Crestwood also introduces its campers to the joys of camping out. Campers completing Grade 2 and up have the option of participating in a week-long trip to an overnight camp, and all campers are encouraged to participate in an in-camp overnight which features a cook-out and a traditional campfire and sing-a-long.

The camp experience at Crestwood also includes supervised arts and crafts (featuring a full pottery program), drama, dance, performance art, puppetry and various athletic activities. Pre-schoolers are offered a full sports program including T-Ball, soccer and co-operative team games, helping them develop hand-eye co-ordination and motor skills. An exciting archery program is always a favorite of the children. Tennis is available to older campers, as well as a challenging low-level ropes course.

Crestwood has a "very professional swimming program," Wise says, explaining that campers take part in two swim sessions daily, one of which is recreational and the other which is instructional according to the Red Cross guidelines. "We overhire qualified swim staff," Wise says, "because we want to ensure that our campers have the best swim instructors available, with small instructor-camper ratios." Crestwood has four heated swimming pools on site, and has the use of the olympic-size pool at nearby Glendon College.

Crestwood's Baseball Training Camp encourages campers who have completed Grade 1 and up to take part in an intensive program focusing on the development of skills and confidence, coached by experienced instructors. Campers in this program enjoy baseball in the mornings and join the rest of the camp for regular activities for the afternoon.

Campers never long for the conveniences of home while they experience the great outdoors. They are provided with convenient door-to-door transportation and are served full catered nutritional lunches. Crestwood School's air-conditioned classrooms and modern gymanasium are available for inclement weather.

Wise adds that campers revel in "the cozy, family-type atmosphere" of Crestwood. "Our (160) staff members are very close, and very spirited, building lasting memories for our children."

Even more in '94

Exciting things are happening! The Youth and Hechalutz Department of the Canadian Zionist Federation, which has been offering sensational Israel Programs for well over two decades — programs which range from 5-6½ weeks — is this year adding two new components to a summer in Israel.

Imagine cycling your way through magnificent terrain enjoying the scenery along the Mediterranean coast, or through parts of the Galilee. Cycle Israel will afford this opportunity.

Have you ever thought about teaching Israeli youngsters how to skate and play hockey? No — we didn't think so! The first two weeks of a five week Israel on Ice will be spent doing just that.

Great variety of programs

Of course, there is a great variety of possible program options for travellers aged 15-24. Stay on Kibbutz, experience Gadna, hike the country sea-to-sea, spend a glorious special week in Jerusalem, snorkel on the coral reef, see sunrise from atop Massada!

Live and work on Kibbutz and experience this unique way of life in a special program which includes workshops, discussions, regional touring and work assignments — a true hands-on opportunity.

The most incredible summer

This represents only a small portion of what awaits you in the most incredible summer of your life! Live and breathe what 700 young Canadian men and women from 1993 will always remember with everlasting warmth and excitement!

Travel and learn about your roots, live in Israel with Canadians from the Maritimes to Vancouver, people who are bound to become life long friends, develop strong ties with your Israeli peers — all this is guaranteed to lead to the best summer ever for you!

For all the information about options for 1994, please contact your local Israel Youth Program Centre. If you live outside the local calling area, we welcome your collect call to the nearest centre.

This is your year — Israel awaits you!

"THE MOST INCREDIBLE SUMMER OF MY LIFE!"

"There was never a dull moment on the trip, between Gadna, camel riding and snorkelling on the coral reef, the 6 weeks flew by and we realized that we were leaving Israel with memories that would stay with us forever. Thanks for everything,"
Bevie Mitelman

Chocky's offers one-stop shopping at low prices

Chocky's Uptown and B. Silverstein & Sons offer one-stop camp shopping at unbeatable prices. The stores sell high quality brand-name camp gear at wholesale prices, and they guarantee their prices are the lowest in town.

Both stores have a giant selection of everything a child needs for camp — shorts, jeans, T-shirts and bathing suits plus all the required accessories, including socks, underwear and pajamas.

"People come here because it's the only place besides department stores where you can buy everything," says owner Danny Silverstein. "We sell everything and sell it at the right price, 50 per cent less than at department stores."

In our current harsh economic climate, B. Silverstein and Sons and Chocky's Uptown continue their tradition of discount prices. "Because of our low markup, we will survive this recession," said Silverstein.

"People are looking for a bargain and we will sell at wholesale prices. Consumers keep coming back, not just year to year but generation to generation."

As the name suggests, B. Silverstein and Sons is a family-run business. Danny Silverstein's grandfather opened the first location on Spadina Avenue, and the family started Chocky's Uptown on Finch Avenue, near Dufferin, three years ago.

B. Silverstein & Sons and Chocky's have built up a loyal clientele because they sell durable high-quality products at rock-bottom prices and offer attentive personalized service. "We don't let people buy the wrong item," said Silverstein. "If it's the wrong size, we'll say so. We want our customers to be happy when they get their purchases home.

"We're not in business to make a quick buck, we're here for the long haul. We want first and foremost to give good service, the way my father and grandfather did from day one."

For shopping atmosphere, other clothing stores can hardly compete with B. Silverstein & Sons and Chocky's. "Shopping here is a family outing," says Silverstein. "Parents come down here with the kids, we give them bagels and coffee and they spend hours filling huge shopping bags."

He assures price-conscious shoppers that his stores are head and shoulders above the competition because of their wholesale prices and wide selection. "People don't want junk. They want the right goods and the name brand goods at the right price. No one else offers that."

B. Silverstein and Sons and Chocky's Uptown offer that and much more.

Check it out. You're sure to become a regular. This store is one that truly sells itself.

Klub Kidz camp cares

Choosing what you think is the right day camp for your child isn't always easy.

There are a lot of factors parents must consider when making a decision such as: nutrition, safety, the variety of programs offered, location, transportation, experienced and friendly staff and most important of all . . . ensuring that your children will come home with smiles on their faces after having an entire day filled with fun.

If any of the above factors have crossed your mind, then your search for the right day camp is over because Klub Kidz is your answer.

Klub Kidz is a privately owned and operated day camp for children between the ages of 3-14. The camp is conveniently located at Dunlace Public School in North York and transportation is included in the total fee.

Candi Drescher and Robert Wise are the camp directors of Klub Kidz, and with their combined years of experience, they have designed and created the perfect setting for your children to have the best summer year after year.

They have thought of everything in order to ensure your child's happiness from qualified staff who are educated and trained, to a enormous variety of programs that are designed to enhance and develop each child's skills individually.

Drescher and Wise have even put together a Parent's Guide To Better Camping brochure, so that every parent can be well informed about the camp's schedule, regulations and procedures.

You can sign your children up for a four-week, six-week or eight-week session.

Klub Kidz offers full indoor and outdoor recreational facilities including two nursery rooms, a fully-equipped indoor gymnasium, 18 acres of professionally developed playfields and a nearby swimming facility, where children are able to participate in Red Cross swimming instruction and recreational swims.

The camp provides snacks, refreshments and fully-catered nutritional lunches. The special part about lunch time, is that the children eat all together and can spend time with other children who may not be in their daily groups.

Activities include everything from special theme days and a three-day camping trip to arts and crafts, cartooning, painting, sculpture, land sports and games — baseball, floor hockey, swimming, tennis, gymnastics, archery; theatre arts — stand-up comedy, singing, dancing, magic; camp craft, science and nature — hiking, nature and environmental studies, rocketry, survival games and much more.

There is even a preschool program for 3 to 5 year-olds and a special sports camp for boys and girls ages 6-13.

The sports camp places emphasis on skill development, co-ordination, sportsmanship, rules, fielding and physical fitness. All programs are taught by experienced coaches, and the camp provides sports uniforms.

Parents are invited to attend special parent/child events and they can stop by during the day for lunch and activities, as long as they notify the camp ahead of time.

Space is limited, so call 614-6915 to register your child today.

"THE ULTIMATE CAMP ADVENTURE"

Creativity at Kidsworld

Kidsworld is in its 14th year of quality camping. Parents have been choosing Kidsworld for its creative programming for all these years.

Careful thought and much creativity go into the program. Every day something special is happening at the camp, from theme days to camivals, olympics, professional entertainers, and more. Specialty staff are hired to create unique activities in the areas of music, drama, art, kindergym and sports. Both fine and gross motor skills are developed throughout the summer.

Instructional swimming is one of the most important parts of the day. The campers are carefully supervised and they are taught the various skills for the Red Cross swim program.

Mrs. Rochelle Weinberg has directed the camp since its inception. She holds a master's of education degree, an early childhood education diploma and has taught for 18 years.

She chooses only the most qualified staff through a careful screening process. This wonderful staff is one of the reasons the camp is so popular among parents. With door-to-door bussing, hot lunches and snacks, instructional swimming and trips all included in the low price, parents have known for years that Kidsworld gives the most value for the best price!

Create a memorable summer

Bayview Glen Day Camp has been "creating unforgettable summer memories" since 1962.

Centrally located at Don Mills and York Mills, Bayview Glen Day Camp has an ideal campsite. When you walk in through the front door, you enter a large air-conditioned building, for use during extremely hot or rainy days; when you exit the building through the back door you are in a maginificent green parkland with a baseball diamond, a soccer field and campfire area, all surrounded by 40 acres of Conservation Woodland with hiking trails and cookout areas.

New for '94 is our huge gymnasium, featuring skylights and removable sides. What a great way to bring the outdoors inside while still offering protection from the sun.

There is daily Red Cross swim instruction in the on-site heated pools, fresh lunches are prepared at the camp, and door to door transportation is provided using only small buses to decrease the amount of time spent in transit.

Campers are 2 to 13 years old and there is a staff training program for 14 and 15 year-olds. The program is from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. and a half-day program from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m. is offered for 2 or 3 year olds. There is also the option of an extended day until 6 p.m.

For further information or to arrange for a tour of the facilities, please call 449-7746.

Top camping at low costs

Camp Eitan has been directed by Rabbis Michael Levine and Moshe Weinberg for the past 14 years.

Both teachers at Eitz Chaim Schools, they pride themselves on offering the most in camping for the lowest price. The prices are the same as last year and include such services as door-to-door bus transportation within our designated area, hot kosher lunches (under COR supervision) and basic instructional swimming.

Also inluded are gymnastics, overnights, computers, arts and crafts, as well as weekly trips and a varied sports program. The camp is located in Eitz Chaim Schools and offers modern air-conditioned indoor facilities for rainy day activities.

A recent innovation in our boy's division is our baseball camp, offered at our same low price. Coaching, video instruction, practice and game situations are all aimed at helping campers even at the lower skill levels,

As well our girls' division has been divided into two levels to better meet the needs of each age group.

In our preschool division, special daily events, preschool classrooms and playground equipment, a weekly theme and a caring staff provide the younger child with a safe and happy summer experience.

How is this camp different?

Camp Moshava, situated in the beautiful Kawartha Lakes region of Ontario, offers swimming, boating, sports, crafts, drama, shira, and rikud.

But so does everybody else.

Moshava offers a full range of programs, overnights, theme days, trips, hikes and special events.

But so does everybody else.

What Camp Moshava offers that no other camp in Canada can offer is a totally integrated community, based on the Orthodox Zionism of Bnei Akiva.

Now preparing for its 36th season, Moshava has helped to encourage a generation of Canadian Jewish children in their love of Israel and their dedication to Torah v'avodah. It's not just in the time we set aside for daily tefilla and shiurim; it's in how we play basketball and what we make in arts and crafts and what sefarim our counsellors learn in their spare time.

It's the singing late on Shabbat afternoon when the sun is going down and the quiet in the Beit Knesset as Eicha is read on Tisha b'Av and the cheering at the end of color war. It's the sound of 200 voices singing Hatikva together as the Israeli flag is raised each day.

It's Camp Moshava.

Camp Moshava accepts applications for campers completing Grade 3 through Grade 9. A new program for campers completing Grade Ten is being instituted this year.

The camp is under COR supervison.

A Camp Gesher experience

Camp Gesher is situated on beautiful Pringle Lake in Ontario's Land O'Lakes, 100 kilometres north of Belleville.

It is one of six non-profit camps in North America sponsored by the Habonim Dror Youth Movement, in co-operation with the United Kibbutz Movement, Na'amat Canada and the Labour Zionist Alliance.

Kibbutz is one of the most interesting lifestyles in Israel today. It is representative of a true integration of Jewish, communal, social and pioneering values. Inspired by the kibbutz in Israel, Camp Gesher offers a valuable educational experience.

Individual development is encouraged within co-operative group living. From the time campers arrive, they encounter challenges, experience fun and form lasting friendships.

The camp's program includes numerous sports and waterfront athletic activities. The avodah (work projects) engage campers in carpentry, painting, landscaping, cooking and a small animal farm while the tzofiut (scouting) will have them out on canoe trips and overnight campouts.

Integrated groups

Mindful of individual preferences, the camp has integrated interest groups into the program. These chugim range from drama, folkdancing, in-depth discussion sessions to nature survival.

Love of the Hebrew language is created through informal Hebrew sessions and lively Hebrew skits and songs in the daily camp routine. An informal educational program focuses on Jewish history, social justice, Zionism and Israel.

A staff of experienced counsellors from the leadership corps of Habonim Dror assures careful, individual supervision.

Training program

Many counsellors are graduates of the Habonim Dror workshops in Israel and are leaders of groups in their own cities.

A registered nurse is in attendance 24 hours a day to supervise the health program and sanitation procedures. A fully-equipped infirmary is maintained and a doctor is on call.

The campers are housed in cabins and are provided with modern sanitation facilities and showers. There is a spacious auditorium and ample recreation rooms.

Camp Gesher accepts boys and girls from 9 to 16 years of age for a full session of seven weeks or half sessions of three or 3½ weeks. For older campers, Habonim Dror offers a Summer in Israel program and a Leadership Training program in the camps.

For more information call: Orit Praag in Toronto (416) 633-2511 or (416) 223-6233, or call Meir Moran (613) 224-2198 or 224-4589 or fax (613) 224-2198. Interested parties may also write to P.O. Box 5288, Station F, Ottawa, Ont., K2C 3H5.

Day camp has full waterfront facilities

The Lubavitch Day Camp has earned a well-deserved reputation for its well-organized, fun-packed program of sports, aquatics, crafts and culture.

The camp caters to boys and girls from the ages of 2½ to 12. The daily schedule runs from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m., Monday through Friday, during the months of July and August. Transportation is provided and the children are served nutritious lunches and snacks. The camp has its own outdoor pool and provides instructional swimming in addition to recreational swimming.

There's a program for 3 to 5 year-olds from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. and also a morning program from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. for 2½ year-olds.

The children play hard, make new friends and meet with old ones. All of the benefits of camp life are certainly apparent. Kids spend time with other kids. They share, develop and mature in a way that doesn't exist in the classroom. At camp, they participate in a panorama of exciting activities all day and this challenging interaction brings out their best, socially, physically and creatively.

But there is still more at the Lubavitch Day Camp: the children are taught about what it means to be a Jew. Each week they explore a different theme and this theme becomes integrated into the daily routine. For example, what elsewhere is "learning to get along" is elevated to the mitzvah theme of ahavat Yisroel — love your fellow Jew. This concept is studied, investigated and developed with stories, songs, skits and crafts. Yiddishkeit is taught to be more palpable than a set of rules, especially to a child discovering what's right and wrong.

The counsellors at Lubavitch Day Camp are carefully chosen and they don't give orders. They are summer mentors who guide and instruct. Almost all of them have a camping background and a wealth of experience. Their objective is to instill a positive perspective in the camper that will endure long past the summer months.

Exciting

Each week there is a full-day trip — an excursion to one of the exciting spots in or around Toronto. There's bowling and roller skating, carnivals and puppet shows. Once a week the campers bring home a newsletter or newspaper. This enables the parents to find out what is doing at camp, as well as supplying engrossing and entertaining reading for the campers.

Rich or poor, observant or not, Jewish children fom all backgrounds feel comfortable at Lubavitch Day Camp. Everyone learns a little, grows a little and has lots of fun.

Registration is in full swing for the summer of '94. Don't miss this opportunity. Your children will enjoy a summer experience that will be appreciated long after the summer months end.

For more information and registration, call Rabbi Mendel Bernstein at 731-7000.

Knowledge of Judaism essential

A question for the new year: How much should a Jew know about Judaism to be culturally informed? Opinions, of course, will differ but may I suggest the following ten areas of knowledge (with acknowledgement to the late Rabbi Robert Gordis for his insights on the subject).

1. A knowledge of the basic fundamentals of Hebrew. This means being able to read the language fluently, thus being capable of joining in a religious service.

2. A knowledge of "functional" Hebrew, that is to say, of those words and idioms which all Jews used, irrespective of the language they spoke, and which they retained untranslated because they represent specifically Jewish conceptions, ideals and practices. Familiar examples include Shabbat, Tanach, kosher, get, kovod, rachmones, There are many hundreds more which should become part and parcel of the vocabulary of modern Jews.

3. A familiarity with Jewish customs and ceremonies, their history, development and meaning through the centuries.

4. An interpretation of the basic Jewish religious ideas, which constitute the heart of Judaism. Most Jews are uninformed about Jewish teaching on the issues of God and man, life and death, covenant and chosenness, messiah, prayer and the essential differences from Christianity and Islam.

5. A survey of Jewish history from ancient times to the present, of the events, movements and personalities that march across the centuries of Jewish experience. Without a knowledge of the past, we lack the key to the present.

6. A knowledge of the Bible. With a grounding in its background, language and ideas, modern Jews will discover once again that the Bible is the foundation of Judaism and much of modern culture.

7. A conception of the Talmud and its literature, including an understanding of its structure, form, major personalities, fundamental ideas and ethical teachings.

8. An appreciation of modern Hebrew and Yiddish literature, many of the masterpieces which are now available in English translation.

9. A knowledge of the history of Zionism, the modern resettlement of Israel, and the various schools of Zionist and Israeli thought. Jews need to know the story of the heroic struggle for independence and the establishment of the State of Israel. They should become familiar with its miraculous achievements as well as its massive problems.

10. Finally, an understanding of the many-sided, contemporary Jewish scene in North America and in the world.

Books in the all the areas indicated above are now widely available. They have reached an all time high, both in quality and in quantity.

The new year is an opportunity to embark upon a program of increased understanding and appreciation of our many-sided legacy. It will make some demands on time and energy. But the rewards are great. They include the awareness that Judaism is far more than a reaction to anti-Semitism, that the Jewish religion is more broad in scope than a series of prohibitions, and that Jewish literature is by no means a series of unending lamentations.

Frid does well in the Orient

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Misha Frid has just returned from a multi-media exhibition in Seoul where his sculpture met with acclaim and sold well.

SIART '93, hailed as the first international art show in South Korea, attracted numerous entrants from a dozen countries and sparked enthusiastic response.

For centuries, much of the Orient was cut off from outside influence, and it is only in the last 50 or 60 years that it has begun to open up, Frid notes, adding that even though an ancient culture flourished, the people, exposed at last to Europe and the West, "want to suck in everything — music, art, ballet."

He has acquired an Asian representative and will exhibit in Tokyo and Hong Kong this year.

Born 1938 in Moscow, Frid came to North America with his family in 1973. A Canadian citizen, he makes his home in Toronto, working out of New York as well.

Driven by a fertile mind, he reaches constantly for new methods of expression. At 53 he combines the confidence of experience with the vision of ongoing youth. His sculpture evolves. It is never stagnant.

Frid is a master of the classic bronze figure; yet he probes his imagination to develop changing form, added dimension. A recent series explored the hypnotic power of music as it affected the relationship between man and woman. There was a certain tautness in the figures as they played on one another. A new collection elongates the human form and strikes a contemporary male-female balance, an emerging freedom.

In one piece, man, representing nature, is symbolically portrayed as a tree. Woman lies in the grass, touching his roots. Both are concerned with the environment. A more provocative work reveals a woman trying to soar independently above a man who offers her liberty yet with a hint of reluctance. He recognizes the inevitable, but pulls back just a little.

Like other superbly trained artists who emigrated from the former Soviet Union, Frid feels the urgency to cross over from safe replication to the experimental world of the here and now. Always stretching, he moves from the grace of the cello and harp in his Music series, to the jazz scene. Striving for relevance, he is currently modeling and remodeling two figures, a laid-back saxophonist and a leaping dancer.

Nature, a bronze sculpture by Misha Frid.

Just as the Koreans want to absorb western culture, Frid needs to be part of his new world. But consistently his credo is to project beauty, to let the viewer dream.

For the first time in his career, he is giving classes in Toronto for professional sculptors, focusing on composition, portrait and live models. He will accept a limited number of other art students. And he is offering a specialized course in composition specifically for plastic surgeons who want to enhance their artistic knowledge and flexibility skills.

Through 1994, Frid will mount exhibitions in New York and other U.S. cities as well as the Orient. He is also looking toward exhibiting in Israel, where he has a brother and sister.

For more information contact Frid at 889-2479.

Sherman play makes grade

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jason Sherman, a 31-year-old Jewish playwright, has joined the charmed circle of Canadian writers who have their plays premiere at Tarragon Theatre, the shrine of writers who have made the grade.

Sherman last year won the prestigious Chalmers Award for outstanding new play with A League of Nathans about three young Canadian Jews named Nathan and their differing concepts of Judaism and Israel.

His new play, Three in the Back, Two in the Head, which runs to Jan. 29, presented by Tarragon and Necessary Angel and co-produced with the National Arts Centre, Ottawa, does not have Jewish characters or a Jewish theme.

Sherman's latest play explores the motives of a Canadian scientist who wants to ensure world peace by working on a shield against nuclear attack, and his relationship with the Pentagon and the CIA, the latter agency ordering his murder. A military scientist against war is indeed a fresh idea but we never learn how he worms his way into the Pentagon. The plot's frame is an attempt by his son to clear his father's name, which goes awry when the son's own motives are called into question.

It's a "talky" thriller which keeps you pinned to your seat for 95 minutes, but anyone looking for new insights into politics and the arms game will be disappointed.

The acting and the staging are magnificent (a segment with reflecting mirrors giving double and triple images should win an award), but it is hardly a surprise that CIA agent (Ron White) is ruthless, that the Pentagon general (Guy Bannerman) is unprincipled but spouts morality, and that the Canadian scientist (Ken James) is caught in the CIA snares.

Sherman's strength is his ability to capture the double-talk and the "snow jobs" that people with power are able to use to defeat their opponents. The direction by Richard Rose is brilliant, the flashbacks are melded seamlessly, and the lack of substantial content can almost be forgiven, so cleverly are the dialogue and visual elements combined in the direction and Graeme S. Thomson's set.

Gershwin tunes outstanding in Mirvish's Crazy For You

By JEFF ROSEN
CJN News Editor

TORONTO — It's got music, it's got rhythm . . . who could ask for anything more?

Of course, when you're dealing with the Gershwin brothers — George and Ira — you get much more.

But what else could you expect from the creative team that produced such hits as Embraceable You, But Not For Me and I Got Rhythm? First introduced along with three others in the 1930 musical Girl Crazy these tunes are now back in Ed and David Mirvish's latest mega-musical comedy Crazy For You, appearing at the Royal Alexandra Theatre for an indefinite run.

Borrowing a number of Gershwin masterpieces from other sources, Crazy For You flows easily from one number to another — proof positive that good music never goes out of style.

Of course it helps when you have an engaging tale to tell, a talented cast and superb choreography to boot. While slightly dated (there was no such thing as politically correct back in the '30s) and corny, the story which connects the Gershwin classics is hilariously funny. It's a classic tale: city boy meets country girl, loses girl and finally gets girl after a whirlwind mixup.

Along the way there's even a chorus line audition which rivals the one found in Chorus Line, a scene in which two characters believe they are the mirror image of each other and a send-up from Les Miserables, the last mega-production to play at the Royal Alex.

And of course some very funny exchanges between characters, such as: She: "I did not come here to be insulted." He: "Really, where do you go?" and She: "Can you give me a room and a bath?" He: "Ma'am I can give you a room, but you'll have to get your own bath."

Like I said, pure corn, but in the best way. Crazy For You is sure to banish any winter blues which come your way.

BILL GLADSTONE'S

EYE ON ARTS

Appointed last September, the Art Gallery of Ontario's new chief curator is Matthew Teitelbaum, whose family has had a long association with arts and culture, both in Toronto and internationally. Teitelbaum, former curator of Boston's Institute of Contemporary Art and Canadian galleries in Saskatoon and London, seems glad to be back in his native city.

"It's an exciting time to be working in Toronto," he says. "Toronto is a real centre for the performing arts and the literary arts, and we're hoping we can make it even more of a vibrant centre for the visual arts."

Besides shaping the AGO's permanent collection, the curator is responsible for special exhibitions, encouraging gifts, and "articulating the different roles that art may have in contemporary life and arguing for their importance." Teitelbaum readily concedes that he fulfils an entirely public role and that the public has a right, especially in an era of fiscal restraint, to make curators at public institutions squirm by scrutinizing acquisitions.

"Where I think it gets messy is when it relates to the economics of the situation. I think the notion that the National Gallery shouldn't be spending that kind of money on a canvas by Mark Rothko is simply misguided. If you use that kind of argument, you could always find more useful things than cultural activities to spend your money on over the short term."

Excited by the possibilities of the AGO's newly-renovated exhibiting space, Teitelbaum says his main challenge "is to place the Art Gallery more centrally in the imagination of the city. We want to convince people that the Art Gallery is a place where they can come to be entertained and also to learn."

Among AGO's many possessions are several paintings by the curator's father. The late Mashel Teitelbaum, who painted in both abstract and representational modes, gained his greatest recognition for a series of abstract canvases rendered in the 1960s. The curator's mother is Ethel Teitelbaum, a key volunteer with the Jewish Film Society, which screens movies in the AGO's Jackman Hall.

By fluke, Toronto-based actress-filmmaker Cayle Chernin discovered descendants of the Russian family her grandfather had left behind when coming to Canada more than 80 years ago. In late 1992 she visited her new-found cousins and taped the reunion with the hope of making a feature documentary.

As part of the project, Chernin videotaped a reunion of her large Canadian family in Glace Bay last summer. While in Nova Scotia, she managed to sell television rights to the completed work to CBC Halifax. She intends to visit Israel in May to ensure the documentary includes several Russian relatives who have made aliyah. Russian Relatives is the working title of Chernin's film. A sneak preview has been scheduled for room 421 of the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St., on Thursday, Jan. 20 at 7:30 p.m. Chernin will introduce the screening, which is offered under the auspices of the World Jewry and International Affairs Committee of Canadian Jewish Congress. Admission is free.

Temple Sinai, 210 Wilson Ave. between Bathurst and Avenue Rd., offers what its musical director Ben Steinberg says is "the most extensive music series of any synagogue in the city."

One of the congregants, Louis Applebaum, is a veteran composer with hundreds of works to his credit. His compositions have been heard at Canadian state functions such as the opening of Expo '67, the installations of three governors general, and visits by the Queen. An officer of the Order of Canada, Applebaum has received honors from many colleges and universities.

An original 18-minute Applebaum composition is set to receive its premiere performance at Temple Sinai on Friday, Jan. 21, as part of the Shabbat Shira ("Sabbath of Song") service that begins at 8:15 p.m. Applebaum's setting of the Alvin Fine poem Life's Journey involves cantor, double-chorus, organ and vibraphone. Performers under Steinberg's direction include cantor Thomas Schwartz and noted musician-composer Haygood Hardy on vibraphone and percussion. "Louis Applebaum wrote this work for us, and we have the privilege of presenting it," said Steinberg. "This is kind of a special event among special events. It's giving the whole congregation a glow."

The work and its premiere presentation have been dedicated to the memory of Kerry Sufrin, a young musician who passed away a year ago. His parents are Mel Sufrin, executive director of the Ontario Press Council, and Malcah Sufrin, formerly a teacher at Forest Hill Collegiate.

Steinberg has been Temple Sinai's musical director for 24 years. Some 1,500 families (about 5,000 people) are members of the synagogue, which he describes as "reform but quite traditional."

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

For the fourth time since 1988, a group of young Canadians is set to participate in a March of the Living tour of Poland and Israel from April 4 to 17.

Some 350 students, accompanied by about 70 adults, hope to visit important sites of Polish-Jewish history, such as Warsaw, Cracow and Lublin. According to the schedule, Yom Hashoah — Holocaust Memorial Day — will find the group at Auschwitz-Birkenau. As in previous tours, participants will walk the bleak path that hundreds of thousands of Jews and others trod on their way to annihilation.

Afterwards, they will participate in a religious service in the concentration camp, in commemoration of all victims of the Holocaust. They also plan to visit Holocaust-related sites like Treblinka and Majdanek. The group expects to be in Israel on Yom Ha'atzmaut — Israel Independence Day — and to tour sites of importance to Jewish history, survival and redemption.

In advance of the tour, its young participants (who are between 15 and 18 years old) are reading about and discussing the Holocaust to better understand what they will see.

"The point of the program is to shape a new generation of Canadian youth at a critical stage of their development," says Eli Rubenstein, national director of young leadership development for the United Israel Appeal of Canada, which is sponsoring Canadian involvement in the March. "We hope that the program will start a process that will one day blossom into a lifelong dedication to Jewish causes and concerns."

Afterwards, tour participants will be encouraged to express their emotions in art, music, writing and other creative forms, and to share their knowledge with audiences in their respective communities.

Amy Lerman, an 18-year-old OAC student (Grade 13) at York Mills Collegiate, says that her involvement in the 1992 March of the Living "was the most unbelievable experience of my life. I learned a lot — more than I expected to learn. I had been to Israel before, but coming there directly from Poland was very different. We came out of a place that had hated us and everything we stood for, and we went to a place that welcomed us."

The experience made the Holocaust "very real" to her, says Lerman, who is currently reading the novel Schindler's List to prepare herself for the movie. "The March of the Living is a very emotional and a very draining experience, but I would definitely recommend it."

Jewelry, sandals, bits of cloth and hair — these and other artifacts from the ancient mountaintop fortress at Masada are being shown to the public now through April at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's Institute of Archaeology.

In 73 CE, Roman forces besieged and eventually overran the Jewish encampment at Masada. Rather than surrender and be enslaved, the Jewish defenders chose death. Thirty years ago, when the late Professor Yigal Yadin supervised excavations at Masada, clay fragments bearing Hebrew names were found. Yadin viewed these clay fragments as the lots cast by the Masada defenders to determine the order in which they would commit suicide.

Other items on view include make-up and make-up accessories, cooking and eating utensils, and papyrus records of the Roman army's infirmary equipment. Inscriptions tell of shipments of food to Masada such as fish oil from Spain and apples and wine from Italy.

Entitled The Story of Masada, the exhibition is a joint project of the Hebrew University, the Israel Antiquities Authority and the Israel Exploration Society. Admission is free.

Years ago, an uncle and aunt of mine used to enjoy spending their Passovers at a certain deluxe kosher resort in the Catskills. The tradition ended abruptly one year, however, when my uncle called up two weeks before Pesach to confirm his standing reservation. Seems the establishment had fallen into the hands of the Hare Krishna, who had converted it into a meditative retreat.

The moral? Things happen. Nothing stays good forever. All the fates and fortunes of the world are in perpetual flux. Just consider two contemporary examples, if you will: Mexico and Puerto Rico. Readers may recall that Mexico's Yucatan Peninsula was featured in last week's column. What was missing, of course, was any mention of the recent peasant rebellion-cum-guerrilla war against NAFTA, that last week prompted the Canadian government to issue a travel advisory. Although the Mexican troubles do not seem widespread, visitors should utilize common sense and caution.

As for Puerto Rico, reports spilled out last week of a grounded oil tanker that quickly ruined vast stretches of beach as well as any hope of a prosperous tourist season this winter. Tourism is one of Puerto Rico's top industries and hotels like the Hyatt Dorado Beach Resort, which had offered a comprehensive Passover package, may suffer tremendously. Thankfully, production of agricultural staples like sugar and coffee on the mountainous island remains unaffected.

Passover vacation

Seeking a glatt kosher Passover vacation in a tropical setting? Presidential Kosher Holidays of New York has organized a 10-night Pesach program at Puerto Rico's Hyatt Dorado Beach Resort from March 25 to April 3.

The package includes transfers to and from San Juan airport, air-conditioned luxury accommodations, three kosher meals daily, and two complete seders. Passover menus are being prepared under the supervision of New York's Levana Restaurant. Religious services are to be held daily at an on-site synagogue. Situated on Puerto Rico's serene north shore, the 298-room Hyatt Dorado shares 1,000 well- landscaped acres with a neighboring Hyatt Regency resort. The Dorado also features secluded beaches, four swimming pools, and programs for children. There are 72 holes of championship golf and 21 tennis courts in the area. For more information, contact Presidential Kosher Holidays in Brooklyn at (718) 332-3900.

Before you visit Mickey Mouse be sure to PLAN

By JUDY SAUL
Special to The CJN

ORLANDO — The immediately recognizable pair of mammoth mouse ears, 16 storeys high, is difficult to miss. The instant I see them, I imagine the tinges of grey hair on my head beginning to fade. We are now on Disneyworld property.

But there is more to this place than its ability to make parents feel young again, or at least young at heart. Disneyworld is a multi-media experience where there's something for everyone. Because of its immense size, there is a myriad of decisions waiting for you even before you reach the front gate.

A well-written guidebook will help you answer many of your questions and others that never crossed your mind. Go to your favorite library to sample the types available, and decide which one is best suited to your family's needs. Then buy the edition you decide upon and start reading! Since Disneyworld (and the surrounding Orlando area) is always expanding, it is essential to buy an up-to-date book.

For this trip, I used Fodor's 94: Walt Disneyworld and the Orlando Area. Two others I would recommend are Birnbaum's Walt Disney World 1994 and Walt Disney World with Kids (1994) by Kim Wright Wiley. Using a guidebook will save you time as you familiarize yourself with the layout of the three theme parks. Here are some of the sightseeing strategies I found useful:

1. Go against the traffic flow. Most people start at the front of the park and work their way in. By planning your visit from back to front, you can see the more popular attraction when they're not crowded (early in the a.m. or late in the day).

2. The amount of ground you cover depends directly on the age of your children. The cardinal rule in travelling with children is to go at their pace! If you dare to disobey this rule it will only lead to tired and cranky travellers. (And the kids won't do well either.)

3. Know where you're going. Whoever has a good sense of direction can be in charge of the brochure provided at each park. Kids hate backtracking and seeing their parents become disoriented because they don't know east from west.

4. As far as eating goes, there's a wide variety of food available (including vegetarian). Check your guidebook for specifics. Whether you bring your own food or buy it on site, make sure your family sits down to eat. Fight the temptation to eat quickly; instead, take advantage of this time to digest not only your food but everything you've been exposed to so far. At Disneyworld it's easy to suffer from stimulation overload.

Epcot Centre is the ultimate model for stimulation overload. When it opened in 1982, Epcot was referred to as an "educational theme park," but those three words should never appear in the same sentence. Epcot does not stand for Every Parent Comes Out Tired. It stands for "Experimental Prototype Community of Tomorrow."

When Walt Disney originally envisioned Epcot in 1966, he said that, "Epcot is now emerging from the creative centres of American industry." Sadly, Mr. Disney did not live to see his brilliant idea come to fruition 16 years later.

Epcot is the park you find yourself spending more time in as your children become older. It is by far our favorite of all three parks. It takes two days to see Epcot in its entirety so if you only have one day, then plan it carefully.

I highly recommend that you put the Wonders of Life and Spaceship Earth (both from Future World) at the top of your list. As for the pavilions in the World Showcase, the ones representing Canada, the United States and China are superb.

As the guidebook states, "in Epcot the thrills are mostly in the mind." But isn't that the true allure of Disneyworld for adults? It is our minds that are being toyed with in Walt's gigantic playground. I have long suspected that Disneyworld was built for adults. Children don't need to be reminded of who they are. But to make adults feel like kids again, that's the magic of Disney.

Perhaps Disney's message is just that — feeling young is only a state of mind. You don't have to travel to Disneyworld each time to recapture that feeling, but it's a great way to get started.

This year, for the first time in my life, I experienced Space Mountain, a roller coaster ride in the dark. I overcame a childhood fear and felt exhilarated. I couldn't stop smiling. This feeling will not wear off as easily as my sun lotion did. And that alone is worth the price of admission. In these times of overpriced attractions that often fall short of our expectations. Disneyworld is truly a breath of fresh air.

Vienna Jewish museum a place of education

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

VIENNA — It's back.

Vienna's Jewish Museum, closed by the Nazis after the German annexation of Austria in 1938, was re-opened late last year.

Speaking at the dedication ceremony, the mayor of Vienna, Helmut Zilk — who was subsequently injured by a letter bomb sent by neo-Nazis — said that the city's history required the restoration of the museum.

"Without Jewish life, Vienna would not be what it is today," he declared. "This museum should be a place of memory, but also a place of education and discussion."

When the museum was originally inaugurated in 1897, Vienna was not only the capital of an empire, but the home of a large and influential Jewish community. Among its most prominent members were the novelists Franz Werfel and Stefan Zweig, the psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud and the journalist Theodor Herzl, the founder of modern political Zionism.

By 1936, 176,000 Jews lived in Vienna. Approximately 100,000 managed to get out before the outbreak of World War II. Many of those who remained behind were rounded up by the Nazis. Vienna's Jewish community was officially dissolved in November 1942, 10 months after the infamous Wannsee Conference in Berlin which decreed that the Jews of Europe should be systematically exterminated.

In all, 65,000 Austrian Jews are believed to have died during the Holocaust. Today, 8,000 people are registered with Vienna's Jewish community, the vast majority of East European origin.

The new Jewish Museum, at Dorotheergasse 11, in the heart of Vienna's old town centre, is housed in a refurbished mansion that was once in the possession of a Jewish banking family.

The core of its permanent collection, which will be displayed in its entirety in 1996, consists of three large collections.

The first of these is the Berger collection, the property of the municipality, with roughly 10,000 items running the gamut from religious and ritual objects to paintings and prints.

The second, owned by the Jewish community, is made up of religious objects, textiles, busts, paintings, drawings, prints, postcards, photographs and autographs. Containing extensive material from the pre-1938 museum, this collection is in poor repair and currently being restored.

The third collection, donated by philanthropist Martin Schlaff, is made up of 5,000 pieces of anti-Semitica: figurines and household utensils with manuscripts, paintings, prints, postcard and Nazi propaganda. A comprehensive exhibition is planned for 1995.

The museum began its activities with a number of temporary exhibitions, all of which close in 1994:

•This Is Where Teitelbaum Lived, which runs until May 15, is a compressed history of Jewish Vienna. The 1938 city telephone directory listed 17 Teitelbaums. The current one does not have a single entry under this name.

•Wien IX, Berggasse 19, which will be on view until March 5, showcases Edmund Engelman's photographs of Sigmund Freud, his wife Martha and their daughter Anna. Engelman took the pictures in the Freuds' apartment at Berggasse shortly before their emigration in 1938. He was apparently the last person to see their flat in its original condition. After the Freuds left, their household goods were scattered.

•The Freudians, which runs until March 5, consists of photographs of Freud and his disciples, taken by Nachum Gidal at the 13th International Conference of Psychoanalysis in Lucerne, Switzerland in 1934.

•Song of Songs, which ends its run on Feb. 13, is a visual interpretation of Manfred Hausmann's Song of Solomon by German painter and sculptor Heinz Mack. This exhibition consists of popular love and wedding lyrics.

•Gertrud and Otto Natzler: Collaboration/Solitude, March to June (exact dates are not given). The Natzlers, Viennese Jews who emigrated to the United States, were distinguished ceramic artists.

•David Rubinger — Witness Of An Era, March 25-June 19. Born in Vienna, Rubinger later settled in Israel. His photographs of the Jewish state have appeared in Time and Life.

Further displays, scheduled for the autumn and winter of this year, will be on the life and times of Joseph Roth, the novelist, and on the Sabbath.

The director of the Jewish Museum, Julius Schoeps, is chairman of European Jewish Studies at the University of Potsdam, near Berlin.

The museum is open Sundays to Fridays from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m., and Thursdays from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m.

A new economic growth theory

By STEPHANIE CHAPMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

While out with the old and in with the new is a cliche that is applied to many situations, relationships and philosophies at this time of year, who would think to connect such a phrase to economics.

Specifically, who would have the desire to rethink, and ultimately, redesign part of the economic theories that have been applied for centuries?

The who is Professor Elhanan Helpman, a leading economist and the new director of the Economic Growth Program at The Canadian Institution for Advanced Research (CIAR).

Helpman will be taking over from founding director Professor Richard Lipsey. Helpman will be working with Professor Ed Safarian at the University of Toronto who has been appointed associate director. In his new role, Lispey will devote his time to preparing a major book on economic growth.

Helpman is currently professor of International Economic Relations at Tel Aviv University. The new international trade theory is his brainchild. He will direct the Institute's program from Israel.

The CJN recently spoke with Dr. J. Fraser Mustard, president of CIAR, in the Institute's downtown Toronto offices about Helpman and the new economic theory.

"Until Helpman did this work, economists didn't really have a good idea what the real returns were in the business of research and development (R&D)," says Mustard. He explains that while it was appreciated by some, it's difficult to incorporate technological innovations into a theoretical framework.

"Technology was seen as coming in and not considered as an economic force. What this group is doing is saying: 'Hey, you've got to put all these [technological advancements] within the framework.' "

How past technological revolutions have affected societies is clearly illustrated. For example, the first major revolution was the harnessing of fossil fuels as a source of energy which fundamentally changed the way society operated. Another saw changes in methods of production and transportation when electricity and electric motors were used.

Professor Richard Lipsey has pointed out that we are in a major techno-economic paradigm shift. He emphasizes that these major technological advances produce wrenching social and economic changes, but huge opportunities for the future.

A paragraph quoted from a January 1992 article that appeared in The Economist further explains the concept. "As such studies multiply, the value of the new growth theory will become clearer. But it is to be hoped that its biggest effect will be to reorder the economic-policy agenda. This is influenced more than most politicians would admit by debates that they barely understand — witness Keynes and demand management after 1945, or Milton Friedman and the monetarism of the 1970s. The new growth theory confirms that governments are mistaken to concentrate so exclusively on the business cycle. If, however, it leads them instead to think harder about education, investment, research and development, trade reform, intellectual-property right and so on, it will be a breakthrough indeed."

Diagnosis

Mustard points out that those who depend on the business cycle alone are excluding the technological advancements that can and do have such a profound effect on all sectors of society.

"So many of your readers who play in the short term on the business cycle are being zapped by long-term change."

When it comes to Israel and Canada, both must become more idea-based, he says. Innovative ideas must be implemented because "if you can't drive and stay with it then your throat gets cut," he says.

The instruments used to create income flow, Canada's natural resources industry for example, may be in jeopardy.

He explains that if a country can't generate income flows from these instruments, employment cannot be sustained. Consequently, if the wealth base declines, wages will not remain at levels to which people have become accustomed. The ultimate result is downsizing - one of the factors contributing to the recession that Canada is currently experiencing.

"Israel and Canada are caught in the same change. A bank knows how to finance objects but do they know how to finance ideas? How do you assess risk and uncertainty?"

In order to begin implementing Helpman's new growth theory, Mustard says the Canadian government must consider four factors.

"One, it must get its diagnosis right — it's a drop in wealth-creating capacity that has hit us. Two, the large part of that decline is because the unit value of natural resources has declined. Three, we are in a period of profound technological shift, and four, you have to be able to move the economy into the new world."

Mustard believes that Israel is further ahead in this implementation process than Canada because "there is a broader awareness in the Israeli community of these issues than in Canada."

The close contact between Israel and Canada is strengthened by the appointment of Helpman as director of the program. Mustard stresses that "it is important the Jewish community understand that it's their support that makes it possible for Helpman to do this and that we still need the support of the Jewish community. By supporting us and Helpman, they are also supporting Israel and Tel Aviv University."

Economic News From Israel

Israel-Romanian Relations Grow

TEL AVIV — Micha Harish, minister of industry and trade, told a gathering of 72 Romanian officials the meeting "was a major step in the development of trade relations with their country."

Harish said despite the problem experienced by Romania in its post-Communist era, Israel definitely anticipates it will become an important trading partner.

This view is confirmed by others who greeted the delegation upon the conclusion of its one-week commercial seminar in Israel.

The major international business mission to Israel, hosted by Bank Hapoalim, follows the visit of an Israeli business and government delegation to Romania several months ago.

A Cool Deal

TEL AVIV — An Israeli company has signed a deal with a Chinese firm to produce and sell air conditioners in the People's Republic of China.

Under the terms of the agreement, the two companies will build a plant in southern China, near the Hong Kong border, where production will begin in 1995, at an initial rate of 150,000 units a year.

In the meantime, the Israeli company, Electra Consumer Products, said it will begin selling its own air conditioners in China.

Electra is negotiating with several underwriters to finance the construction of the new factory in which Electra will hold 55 per cent interest.

Business & Finance

IEDC David Yerushalmi

The Israel cabinet has approved the establishment of a Free Export Processing Zone (FEPZ) in the south of Israel, near the Negev city of Beersheva. The objective of the zone is to stimulate export trade and generate substantial foreign currency revenue by providing an environment isolated from import duties, income tax and exchange control.

The proposed Israel FEPZ differs from its counterparts in other countries in that the government will have no financial interest in the zone. Instead the Israel FEPZ will be entirely the responsibility of the private sector. It is indeed from the private sector that initiative for creation of the zone has come, in the form of a private corporation called the Israel Export Development Company (IEDC). Under this banner, a group of senior American Jewish businessmen sharing a history of philanthropic commitment to Israel, has spent nearly two years and $3.5 million (US) researching and campaigning for its establishment. Their quest is not entirely selfless as they are the leading contenders to receive a franchise from the government to develop and manage the 500-acre site allocated for the zone — a franchise which is potentially extremely lucrative.

The zone's most enthusiastic advocate is IEDC chairman and chief executive officer, American-born lawyer, David Yerushalmi. Isranet News reporter, David Hersham, spoke with Yerushalmi in IEDC's Jerusalem headquarters.

Isranet: Are the new economic realities of the peace agreement likely to affect the establishment of the zone?

Yerushalmi: It is now certainly not the first priority. The government will be getting a huge sum of money if the Gaza/Jericho plan goes through and any time the system gets a huge sum of money it is less urgently inclined to look at any economic reform package. However, the basic facts have not changed. Unemployment is unacceptably high, with no private sector jobs being created, and net direct foreign investment is negative. Bank of Israel figures show that $234 million (US) was invested abroad last year by Israelis, but only $23 million was invested in Israel from abroad. Israel needs the zone (because) you can't suffer that kind of haemorrhage of foreign currency reserve.

Isranet: With the influx of funds as a reward for the peace accord, might the Knesset not dismiss the zone altogether?

Yerushalmi: No, at this point it's a commercial deal. The finance minister understands that in Washington and among American Jews, the FEPZ proposal is seen as the one concrete example of economic reform. Now Israeli politicians are completely behind it because they know they have to do something, they know the old system is collapsing. The're aware of what Washington politicians are saying privately, which is that even if we wanted to continue to give you huge sums of money — and Israel gets more money (in aid from the U.S.) than any other country in the world — something has got to change.

Isranet: One of your principal stated motives in lobbying for the FEPZ is to help reduce Israel's dependence on American aid by creating a very substantial source of foreign currency revenue for Israel. Can you quantify the expected investment from abroad and the net gains in foreign exchange that this will supposedly produce?

Yerushalmi: We expect over $750 million (US) in direct foreign investment within the first two to three years. That alone is more than has been invested from abroad (by way of direct foreign investment) in the last eight years. This figure represents the investment of about 60 companies employing initially 15,000 to 20,000 people. All salaries will be paid in foreign currency. The law allows 2 per cent of foreign workers for management and training, the remaining 98 per cent will be Israeli. They will receive their salary in foreign currency, convert it into Israeli shekels and deposit it in Israeli banks. This alone means an enormous foreign currency influx to offset balance of payments. There is also the additional element of payment for goods and services coming into the zone from Israel. People are not aware that in every zone around the world, for every job created inside the zone, three jobs are created outside in services, and in peripheral or related industries. These will be Israeli companies who will set up in the Negev around the zone where they will receive capital grants and subsidies. They will service the zone, and the money they will be paid will again be in foreign currency. The types of businesses will be security, repair and maintenance, translation services, catering, hotels and some goods. We already know that computer companies coming to the zone want to integrate their products with Israeli products. One of the things Israel has to offer is an enormous source of synergy back and forth — what we call backward linkages to the economy.

As the zone will be a hi-tech not a smoke-stack zone, a lot of the exports will not be goods per se. The products will be software development, data processing, R & D, telecommunications and international financial services — the value of these services is difficult to measure beforehand.

Isranet: The perennial question raised about all zones is whether the zone will genuinely create new employment? or will it not really just be job substitution, as existing domestic companies competing on uneven terms with zone rivals are forced to shed jobs?

Yerushalmi: There is an underlying assumption in your question that there is full employment in the Israel hi-tech sector. We have letters of commitment from prospective zone companies identifying 40,000 new jobs and that figure still stands.

The benefits of the zone are not even close to benefits available to Israeli companies. Even in the non-development areas, a company like Scitex receives exchange rate insurance, a huge sum of money in R&D grants as well as decreased tax at a nominal rate of 10 per cent. Effectively their tax rate is minus. There is no way a company like Scitex would be interested in coming into the zone. For every dollar invested, they get 38 cents from the government. A foreign capitalized (Israeli) company has less taxes than a zone company. An Israeli company that knows the system is better off operating in Tel Aviv than in the zone. Others in development areas even get wage subsidies. We don't compete fairly because Israeli companies have better benefits than we do.

Why is the zone workable? Because the companies coming into the zone are foreign companies who would not normally come and do business here. Why? For a number of reasons enumerated in studies carried out by the Israeli investment authorities: frequent changes in government fiscal policy, bureaucracy and taxation. It has little to do with geopolitical reasons as you might have thought. The fact is if you can create an environment where businesses can exploit Israeli labor — and I mean this only in a positive sense — where the government won't tell you how to run your business or come in on your back pocket and where you know that if you apply to do business in the zone you will receive approval in 21 days, you have created an even playing field that foreign companies want to try out. Companies like Sears Technology are saying "We want to get Israelis hired now and see what kind of talent there is out there."

Isranet: How do you respond to the charge that the zone, in common with others worldwide, will be run on cheap labor and exploit its workers?

Yerushalmi: All the basic conditions of Israeli labor laws are in place including minimum wage, sick leave and maternity leave and we will be bound by international labor treaties. We insist though that every zone company has the de jure right to have a personal agreement with its workers, including binding arbitration, a process which legally prevents strikes. The zone will be watched like a hawk, both [Minister of Labor and Social Welfare] Ora Namir and [Minister of the Environment Yossi] Sarid have said so. We're an experiment and will be under the closest scrutiny, which is why our zone is not going to look like anything Israel has ever seen.

Isranet: You spoke earlier about having the unilateral support of Israeli politicians and yet criticism in the press has been severe — you have even been described as tyrants. Who then is unhappy about the zone?

Yerushalmi: The people who are against it are the people entrenched in the system. The bureaucrats and certain people in the manufacturing sector feel that opening up the Israeli economy to competition is a bad thing. The latter get money from government through subsidies and grants and have no international competition. The insiders make huge amounts of money while the rest struggle to get by, which is why there is so much emigration and such a huge black market. The people who benefit most from the old system are very nervous. We were told by politicians, "We have to isolate the zone politically so we can tell the favored manufacturers they can't touch you."

Israel is a closed system where very few control the purse strings. There are two governments — the elected or political government and the tenured government or civil service. Without bureaucrats who effect change, change does not happen. The finance minister made it clear he was for it, while the bureaucrats led by Yoram Gabai, then head of Revenue, said they were against it. But they weren't against it substantively, it's reform they were against. Gabai's reaction was, I don't like American Jewish businessmen telling me how to do things. His committee rejected the FEPZ idea completely on the grounds of its being discriminatory against Israelis, yet we were the ones who asked for a general law for everybody.

The press are part of that system too. The media receives its information from the civil service. You are allowed to attack the elected government, but not the civil service. When I attacked Yoram Gabai, the media was astounded and that's when they started turning against us.

Isranet: Assuming the legislation is approved by the Knesset, what would be the next stage of the proceedings and when would you anticipate that the zone would become operational?

Yerushalmi: A tender commission consisting of an FEPZ committee and government officers will decide on the area. The next step is for all parties to submit a tender, providing a business plan, identifying the number of jobs and showing a proposed development of the designated zone. The winner will be leased land for a term of 49 years by the Israel Lands Authority.

Isranet: You have invested a significant sum in lobbying for the zone. Should you be successful in the tender, do you expect to make an equally significant return?

Yerushalmi: The zone will be very profitable if two conditions are met — if the Knesset passes the legislation in the same form as it was passed by the cabinet, and if we market the zone properly. We are currently marketing the zone with no land and no law. If they make substantial changes to the law we have to wave goodbye to companies. In almost every country it is governments who promote the zone, not private entrepreneurs taking all the risk. Another element is that the Israeli government has not really yet learnt to believe in free markets — take Shimon Peres' famous reply when asked his position on free market reform and privatization, "We believe strongly in making money through free markets, and we spend it through government." We've said we don't want any money from the government, we just want them to pass the law and when they see the income . . .

Isranet: What is the extent of both the commercial and sentimental involvement of American Jews in the project?

Yerushalmi: All IEDC shareholders are committed Jews who have dedicated considerable time and money to Israel — that was a prerequisite. Financing the building of the zone are investment bankers with particular Israeli connections — Jewish personalities within Salomon Brothers, Bear Stearns and Lehmann Brothers — we focused our search in that direction. They have given very strong commitment to this project, which they would otherwise not provide in Israel.

Companies that will fill the zone are a different element, these are multi-national companies from all over the world, most of them are publicly owned companies — these are the companies that will bring literally billions of dollars of foreign investment to Israel and employ Israelis. Originally we had thought of concentrating on bringing Jewish companies in.

Tips From Pros

By NEIL HIMAL & EYAL AMON
Special to The CJN

Satistics Canada reports millions of Canadians have stashed billions of dollars in Registered Retirement Savings Plans (RRSPs).

The RRSP's attraction is that it is a means of deferring income tax on money you put away as a nest-egg for your retirement years, plus sheltering the interest you earn each year on that money. When you start to make withdrawals from your RRSP you pay tax on the income, of course.

You still have plenty of time to contribute to a 1993 RRSP. In fact, the contribution deadline is actually March 1, 1994. But the sooner you invest in a plan, the better off you'll be. To get maximum benefit from the RRSP concept, you should have contributed to a plan at the start of 1993. There are strict limits to the amount you may contribute to a 1993 RRSP.

If you don't belong to a workplace pension plan, the upper limit should equal the lesser of $12,500 or 18 per cent of your 1992 earned income. The amount was given in a statement attached to the Notice of Assessment that Revenue Canada sent last spring, after your 1992 income tax return was processed.

To claim the $12,500 maximum contribution as a tax deduction in your 1993 income tax return, you'd have to have reported a net earned income of about $69,500 in 1992.

If you are a member of a registered pension plan or a Deferred Profit Sharing Plan (DPSP) sponsored by your employer, your maximum contribution to a 1993 RRSP is limited to 18 per cent of your 1992 earned income or $12,500 (whichever is less), minus your 1992 pension adjustment (PA). The PA amount was shown in a box on your 1992 T4 slips from your employer(s).

Don't become confused if you hear or read that the RRSP maximum contribution rises by $1,000 to $13,500, on Jan. 1, 1994. The higher limit only applies to 1994 RRSPs. In other words, you can't use it to calculate your contribution claim for a 1993 RRSP, even though you can delay your contribution to as late as March 1, 1994.

What is new for the 1993 tax year is that for the first time, common law spouses are treated as married spouses for tax purposes. (Spouses have to be of the opposite sex, however.) This means common law spouses now qualify for spousal RRSP contributions.

A spousal RRSP is the ideal way for a couple to achieve what's termed income splitting. That is, the spouse with the higher income shifts some of his or her income into the name of the lower income spouse.

The lower income spouse is entitled to contribute to his or her own RRSP, up to the allowable individual limit, even if the spouse receives a spousal RRSP from the higher income mate.

The objective is to lessen the ultimate retirement income of a high-income spouse, thus easing the tax burden by building the retirement income of the lower income spouse. This process will lower the family's total bill.

Statistics Canada says that a lot of Canadians haven't been taking full advantage of the RRSP tax shelter. It estimates only 22 per cent of eligible contributors used the total allowable limit for RRSP contributions in the 1992 tax year. The average age of contributors was 42 years old, with a median income of $30,300 and a RRSP contribution of about $2,000.

Changes sought in school start

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's two major Jewish advocacy groups have launched a country-wide campaign to persuade public school boards not to start the next academic year on Sept. 6 — the first day of Rosh Hashanah.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) say beginning classes on the first day of the High Holidays places Jewish children in the public system at an unfair disadvantage.

BBC has mailed letters to school boards, teachers' unions and education ministries and is assembling other materials pointing out the conflict on Rosh Hashanah and other potential problems this coming Yom Kippur, Sukkot and Simchat Torah, which all fall on weekdays.

BB's League for Human Rights is urging educators not to hold classes Sept. 6 and 7.

Congress wants the 1994-1995 public school year to begin earlier or later than the 6th in order to accommodate Jewish students and staff, says CJC's national director of community relations, Bernie Farber.

"The first two days of school are key, especially for younger children. It would adversely affect Jewish students if they missed them," Farber told The CJN last week.

Rosh Hashanah falls on Sept. 6 and 7 this year. Labor Day is Sept. 5. Even though each school board sets its own calendar, Farber said most boards across Canada are slated to begin the academic year on Sept. 6.

CJC is in something of a hurry on the issue, because school boards, at least those in Ontario, are required to submit their 1994-1995 calendars to the Ministry of Education prior to the March break.

As well, since all boards must assign a provincially-mandated number of days toward a school year, the two days of Rosh Hashanah, if taken off by everyone, would have to be made up, either before or after Sept. 6.

Congress has advised community relations staff in all regions to raise the matter with local boards and provincial education ministries.

If the next school year is left unchanged, "staff, students and parents of the Jewish faith would be placed in a position of choosing between their faith and attending school," states a report prepared for the York Region Board of Education — Canada's fastest growing board — by its race relations advisory committee.

A subcommittee of the race relations committee has come up with seven options the board can consider, including allowing the school year to start Sept. 6, as scheduled; beginning the year on Sept. 1; convening classes Sept. 1 and 2 and resuming on the 8th; considering the 6th and 7th as professional days for staff, with classes to start on the 8th, or delaying the start of the school year to Sept. 8 for everyone.

Jose Fernandes, race relations coordinator for the York Region board, told The CJN he's in favor of starting classes for all students on Sept. 8.

"This is an issue of equity. One Jewish family in Sudbury deserves the same consideration as the thousands in York Region," Fernandes said.

He said the board has received "a number" of queries and complaints from Jewish parents.

Rosh Hashanah is considered a significant religious holiday by the board, Fernandes said, meaning Jewish staff and students can be excused from classes. Normally, there are no special events or exams those days.

Starting school Sept. 6 "could prove to be extremely disruptive" to Jewish students and staff, and non-Jewish students who would have to begin their year without their regular teachers, the race relations subcommittee report states.

"Jewish students and staff in schools with a small Jewish population would find the tide of first-day events has passed them by and left them ill-prepared."

All those inconveniences can be avoided if the year begins Sept. 8, the report says.

The York Region board oversees 70,000 students in 125 schools. At some schools, Jewish pupils make up 40 per cent of the student population, Fernandes noted.

The report now goes to the board's director, who draws up the calendar in consultation with various unions. Fernandes allowed that the teachers' unions may not agree to begin work before Sept. 6.

KENYA'S PRESIDENT VISITS

Kenya's President Daniel arap Moi visited the Western Wall in Jerusalem during his recent trip to Israel. It was the first trip to Israel by a Kenyan leader since the African nation won independence 30 years ago. arap Moi announced that Kenya's embassy in Tel Aviv, closed since 1973 when the two countries broke diplomatic relations, will soon be reopened. Rabin says his tough stance on security is succeeding JERUSALEM (JTA) — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin is maintaining that Israel's tough stand on security issues is beginning to show positive results in the negotiations with the Palestinians.

Rabin made the assessment last Sunday, when he met with reporters to discuss the meeting in Oslo the day before between Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Peres and Arafat were in Oslo to attend the funeral of Norwegian Foreign Minister Johan Jorgen Holst, who had been instrumental in lining up a series of secret talks last year in the Norwegian capital that led to the historic self-rule agreement between Israel and the PLO.

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, also in Oslo for the funeral, met separately with Peres and Arafat in an effort to get the Israeli-PLO negotiations back on track.

The negotiations for implementing the self-rule accord have been stalled on several security issues, particularly the question of who will control the border crossings between the Gaza Strip and Egypt, and between the West Bank town of Jericho and Jordan.

At the Oslo meeting with Arafat, Peres reportedly demanded that Israel maintain exclusive control at the Jordan River crossings, and that travelers would encounter Palestinian border personnel only after an initial screening by the Israeli army.

Arafat reportedly did not contest this position.

Peres also told Arafat that a $25 million fund is being established in Holst's memory that would be used to finance projects in the Palestinian autonomous regions once the accord went into effect.

The two are scheduled to meet again this weekend in Switzerland.

Israeli and Palestinian negotiations on security and the transfer of civilian responsibilities were scheduled this week in the Sinai border town of Taba.

Also this past Monday, bilateral negotiations resumed in Washington. Israeli and Syrian negotiators met for the first time in four months to discuss the normalization of relations between Jerusalem and Damascus.

On the eve of the resumption of Middle East peace talks in Washington, U.S. President Bill Clinton and Jordan's King Hussein held a private meeting last Friday at the White House.

A spokeswoman at the Jordanian Embassy in Washington said that Clinton and Hussein also discussed other elements in the U.S.-Jordanian relationship, including aid to Jordan.

"Jordan seeks assistance in terms of its debt problem," she said.

Arafat flew to Cairo on Sunday and met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. He then flew on to Damascus, where he offered his condolences to Syrian President Hafez Assad, whose son, Bassel, died Friday in a car accident.

From Damascus, Arafat was scheduled to fly to Saudi Arabia for what would be his first visit there since the rupture of relations between the Saudis and the PLO during the 1991 Gulf War.

Golan withdrawal opposed

JERUSALEM (JTA) — A large majority of the Israeli public opposes a complete withdrawal from the Golan Heights, even in exchange for a full peace with Syria and appropriate security guarantees.

Such a complete withdrawal from the strategic heights is the price Syria has repeatedly demanded for peace, though Syria has so far refused to fully spell out the extent of the peace it is willing to offer, as Israel has demanded.

According to a survey conducted by the Dahaf Institute last week for the daily newspaper Yediot Achronot, 61 per cent of the Israeli public opposes such an exchange, with 37 per cent supporting it. The margin of error for the poll is plus or minus four percentage points.

However, the idea of a partial withdrawal for a full peace wins wide favor: 62 per cent say they would support a limited withdrawal, and 36 per cent would oppose.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin this month declared he would hold a national referendum to approve a withdrawal from the Golan, which Israel captured in 1967 and annexed in 1981, in the event that an agreement was reached with Syria.

That followed the meeting Jan. 16 between Syrian President Hafez Assad and U.S. President Bill Clinton, at which time Assad was seen to have moved closer toward offering Israel a full peace in exchange for the desired withdrawal.

The cast of the Yiddish version of The Mikado.

Oy Vey'z Mir it's the Mikado

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Gilbert and Sullivan may turn over in their graves, but Toronto audiences are going to hear a Yiddish version of The Mikado at Harbord Collegiate March 5 and 6.

Instead of the tuneful lament Tit-willow, it will be Oy Vey'z Mir and instead of Pooh Bah it will be Shmir Mir (pay me a bribe).

The haunting words of Tit-willow will be replaced by: "Oyf a boym bay a vaser a foygele klein, zingt vey'z mir, oy vey'z mir, oy ve'z mir. (On a branch near a river, a small bird sings woe is me, woe is me, woe is me.)

And, in this version, the Lord High Executioner becomes the Kop-Haker (head chopper) and Ko-Ko becomes Chai-Shpay (I spit.)

The Friends of Yiddish is bringing the Yiddish section of the Gilbert and Sullivan Light Opera Company of Long Island to perform Der Yiddisher Mikado for the first time in Canada. They've played it all around the United States for 10 years.

It's an auspicious event, for in the hallowed halls of Harbord Collegiate, the New York performers will join in a gala reception following the Saturday night show with, among others, famed Harbord alumni Frank Shuster, former mayor Phil Givens, conductor Victor Feldbrill, composer John Weinzweig, Izzie Shopsowitz, Dr. Fred Papsin and Murray Chusiel, who played in G and S operettas on the Harbord stage.

Murray Nesbitt, now a New York city law professor, whose older sisters attended Harbord, will return to his native Toronto to play the lead.

Tickets for the gala are $50 with the proceeds to support the University of Toronto Yiddish Studies Program. For gala tickets, call 635-2883, extension 700. Tickets for the two Sunday performances are $18, or for groups of 25 or more, $16. They are available at Ticketmaster outlets, 872-1111.

Funding problems slow new Associated campus

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Associated Hebrew Schools still needs several million dollars before it can complete the new building on its Thornhill campus, parents were told at a recent information meeting.

The 100,000-square-foot building, now enclosed by a roof, walls and windows, was targeted for occupation in September 1994, but according to school president Harry Krakowsky and building chair Lou Greenbaum, "we cannot guess when the Thornhill campus will open."

Krakowsky said that the completion of the new building depends on several factors, including selling part of the Neptune site to a non-profit housing corporation, tearing down the old Neptune building and putting up a smaller one, renovating the Finch campus to make room for the junior high school, and renovating the Leslie campus in order to add administrative offices. "A big portion of the money we need will come from land sale of the Neptune campus. Selling that land will bring in about $4 million and after that we will be short about $2.5 to 3 million. Once the land sale is completed, everything else will happen at once."

He said that the school is now waiting to hear from the Ministry of Housing regarding the allocation for the Neptune site. "If we receive favorable news from the province within the next four to eight weeks, it is still possible to open the new school in September 1994."

According to Krakowsky, the school has received authority to borrow up to $2.5 million from the bank, but the board of directors fears putting the school at risk by borrowing so much money.

He said that because of the fall United Jewish Appeal campaign, all the school's fundraising efforts had to be put on hold, but the campaign has now restarted. "We are waiting to see what the campaign does. We are on our way but we may have to take a slight pause to see where we are going."

He stressed that school fees will not be raised in order to bring in funds for the new building and denied rumors that there will be a capital levy. "There is no thought or discussion about that. Tuition is used for operation, not capital costs. Historically, the bulk of building funds has come from outside the parent body."

He said that a possibility for September could be to open the nursery and kindergarten wing "but to do that, most of the building would have to be completed, which is still a lot of expense. We have a school system of almost 3,000 students and we must be prudent."

Personal appeal to be made

When asked about the school's fundraising plans, Henry Koschitzky, chairman of the board, said that a personal appeal will be made to several hundred people for funds. "We have targeted people who have an interest in day school education and a group of volunteers has agreed to approach them individually. It is not an easy campaign but we have managed to raise about $2.5 million."

Sheldon Goodman, vice-president of the school and chair of the Neptune building committee said that the government in Ontario has always supported non-profit housing in one way or another and is confident the school will shortly receive favorable news about Neptune.

Several parents put forth the idea of raising tuition in order to cover costs, and one suggested doing everything possible to open the school. "We must make every effort to open by September or we will lose students. I support the idea of some sort of general pledge. I have the feeling that everyone here can afford to pledge even a small amount to the school."

Rabbi Abraham Soffer, educational director, disagreed that parents would pull their children from the school if it did not open on time. "We have conducted the school in this manner very well. What is so terrible about waiting another year?"

According to Debbie Berlach, however, whose two children go to Clark campus by school bus, "We could save the huge bus fees if the school opened in September, because we can walk to the new campus from our home. We had envisioned this campus when we bought our house."

Krakowsky said that Associated Hebrew Schools cannot compare itself to the other day schools who have recently completed new campuses, because "with all its facilities our building is complicated and expensive. We are building it as cost-effectively as possible. We are a private day school, however, that is not funded by the province, so we must look to the community. We are looking at an average pledge from parents at all campuses of about $10,000 over the next five years. It is not an easy job but Jewish education is the best thing for Jewish continuity. We all believe in it and are working on it. Whether the school opens in six, eight or 12 months, it will open and it will be full."

Toronto among UJA leaders

TORONTO — New North American UJA statistics show Toronto just below Los Angeles for total campaign donations.

This year, Los Angeles, the number three city in North America in UJA donations, raised $41.9 million, compared to Toronto's $40.5 million. The Jewish population of Los Angeles at 501,000 is more than three times that of Toronto.

Only three cities in North America topped Toronto for overall UJA contributions — New York, Chicago and Los Angeles. Most centres reported reduced gift giving this year compared to last. Toronto's tally is expected to increase by about five percent.

According to Dr. Stephen Speisman, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, and a well known Toronto historian, the city has a rich reputation for Jewish generosity.

"Whenever this community saw a need, they got together and did something," he points out.

Toronto's first co-ordinated community fundraising drive, called the United Campaign, took place in 1917. In 1937, as the depression clung to Canada and Jewish organizations were going into bankruptcy, Toronto Jewry, says Speisman, once again responded to a critical situation.

"The 1937 campaign was an extraordinary one considering the economic conditions."

Many institutions Torontonians take for granted were the result of historic fundraising efforts. Speisman cites the city's first Jewish home for the aged and Mount Sinai hospital as examples of large charitable enterprises begun by small groups of women.

Much of the motivation for all this generous community consciousness was anti-Semitism.

"This was not a hospitable place for Jews, so Jews wanted to stand together. It was a matter of protection," says Speisman.

Preliminary UJA donor survey data shows anti-Semitism is still a major concern. While worries about prejudice may have motivated donors to give, this year's record results for Toronto's UJA campaign are being attributed to the Challenge Fund which matched all gift increases.

Project helps ultra-Orthodox plug into Quebec social services

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Ultra-Orthodox Jews are often uncomfortable seeking social services at public, and even Jewish communal institutions. Their strict religious code, as well as cultural differences, may limit their use of services offered by agencies unfamiliar with Orthodox practice. Misunderstandings may arise on both sides.

Many frum families simply do not know what services exist outside their communities.

Enter five women from these communities, whose aim is to act as liaison between the social service agencies and the ultra-Orthodox, as well as advocates on behalf of their needs and consultants to agencies who can serve them.

The project is called Ahavas Chesed (love of kindness) and it is directed by Carol Polter, a member of the Agudah community, who describes herself as "an Orthodox woman with a keen social conscience." Ahavas Chesed opened an office in December with a $20,000 grant from the Jewish Community Foundation.

All of the five volunteers are graduates of a CEGEP (community college) level social counselling program at Beth Jacob Seminary, an ultra-Orthodox women's college.

They have raised families and consider themselves familiar with life's challenges.

The project grew out of a survey Polter conducted among representatives of the chassidic sects in the Outremont area, as well as the Tash in Boisbriand north of Montreal, the Agudah and other non-chassidic communities in the de Vimy area, and the Lubavitchers concentrated in Snowdon — a total population estimated at 10,000.

She interviewed 36 key leaders: the rabbis (without whose support she knew she could not proceed); teachers; the traditional chesed workers (mature women who take charge when there is a family problem); and businessmen.

The same problems were clear in each community: poverty, underemployment, and the strain, especially on women, of raising large families. Contrary to the perception, according to Polter, these communities are not always able to "take care of their own" when a crisis arises.

A frequently cited difficulty has been with homemakers. These workers are needed to relieve mothers unable to cope alone or replace them if they are ill.

Homemakers, who are assigned by local community health centres (CLSCs), have to understand, for example, kashruth, the ultra-Orthodox concepts of modesty and the attitudes of these families to raising children.

Most of the ultra-Orthodox live in areas served by the Cote des Neiges and St. Louis-du Parc CLSCs, not CLSC Rene Cassin, which has a Jewish orientation. When the Jewish Family Services Social Service Centre (JFSSSC) and other social service centres were disbanded last April, most of their responsibilities were transferred to the CLSCs.

Polter hopes she can help explain these sensitivities, and when possible, find an Orthodox woman to assist in these homes. In fact, she did just that when the parents of a very large family had to be away for medical treatment, and she obtained foster care money through the Ville Marie youth protection centre.

Generally, she has found the public agencies very receptive to learning about the particular needs of ultra-Orthodox Jews, she said.

The Jewish agencies also need to better understand this segment of the community, Polter said. Few on their staffs are Orthodox and thus these communities are reluctant to seek help from them.

An immediate project is training volunteers from these communities to man Shalom Line, Federation CJA's telephone listening service. Polter thinks greater mutual understanding between caller and listener is possible this way.

In addition, she is hoping Shalom Line will be open in the morning for this group because that is the best time for women to call in, when their families are out of the home. Currently, Shalom Line opens at 4:30 p.m.

Polter does not believe that spousal abuse is more prevalent among the ultra-Orthodox than elsewhere; in fact, she thinks it is less common. But she does recognize the limitations abused women in these communities experience in getting help, and that the problem is not always resolved in the traditional way, by the rabbis.

If a battered woman were to call Ahavas Chesed, Polter said she and her staff would try to counsel her, and bring in an Orthodox professional social worker or psychologist and/or the woman's rabbi, if necessary. Ahavas Chesed has been working closely with Ephraim Rudski, an Orthodox social worker formerly with the JFSSSC.

Polter sees a need for parenting classes and instruction in budgeting; but for members of this community, any such programs must be segregated by gender. Most family life education programs offered by the Jewish Baron de Hirsch Institute are not.

She also would like to launch job retraining programs in the communities to alleviate growing poverty.

All this, however, will require resources far beyond those of Ahavas Chesed. Poulter is hoping that the communities it is intended to serve will help fund the project when the seed money runs out.

"We do not want to usurp anybody else's services. We will work with everyone," Polter stated.

Ahavas Chesed is located in the medical building at 6000 Cote des Neiges Rd., Suite 575. It is open Monday through Thursday, from 10 a.m.-3 p.m.; telephone 737-3029.

Hezbollah member ordered deported

Claims terrorist group operates in Canada

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Hezbollah, the radical Muslim group widely accused of terrorist acts in the Middle East and elsewhere, operates in Canada, according to a suspected member who's been ordered out of the country.

The government has "a solid basis of evidence" to believe Mohamed Hussein Al Husseini is a Hezbollah member and might engage in terrorist acts in Canada, Mr. Justice Bud Cullen of the Federal Court ruled recently in upholding Al Husseini's deportation.

In his ruling, obtained by The CJN, Cullen cited a report from the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), which says Al Husseini admitted membership in Hezbollah and that it operates in Canada, but denied active participation and claimed he was not a terrorist carrying out assignments.

However, "the evidence before the [responsible federal] ministers tells a different story," Cullen stated.

According to a Southam News report published last week in The Ottawa Citizen, Al Husseini, who is in his early 30s, entered Canada in 1991 with false documents and received refugee status two months later.

He was ordered out of the country last month by an immigration adjudicator and is now in custody in Montreal.

Cullen's ruling cannot be appealed but Al Husseini is asking Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi not to send him to his native Lebanon, where he has "a serious chance of suffering persecution," his lawyer, Claudette Meghile, was quoted as saying.

Al Husseini could be sent to the country from which he entered Canada or to his last country of residence, but public documents reveal neither.

After a largely secret hearing, Cullen said it is the belief of CSIS and the immigration minister that Hezbollah, which means Party of God, "is a known terrorist organization which has engaged in a wide range of terrorist activities both inside Lebanon and internationally. These activities include bombings, kidnapping, hijacking and murder."

The court said CSIS and the immigration minister believe Al Husseini "is a member of Hezbollah and [that] there are reasonable grounds to believe Al Husseini will engage in terrorism or acts of violence."

While "membership alone in Hezbollah does not automatically brand a person a terrorist," Al Husseini "only offered a few bits of evidence denying the CSIS claim."

The Lebanon-based Hezbollah, along with other radical groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad, strongly opposes the Israel-PLO accord and has vowed to scuttle it.

According to Southam, Al Husseini tipped off federal officials when he applied for landed immigrant status. The solicitor-general and immigration minister then issued a rarely used national security certificate ordering his detention.

Under the Immigration Act, anyone who will engage or has engaged in terrorism or is a member of a terrorist group cannot be admitted to Canada.

According to Canadian Press, Al Husseini's is the second case to come to light this month of Canadian immigration officials granting refugee status to a suspected terrorist.

The Immigration Department admitted earlier that it allowed Madi Ahmed Abdil Awi, wanted by French police as an Islamic Jihad terrorist, into Canada as a refugee in 1991. He has since fled the country, CP says.

The ruling on Al Husseini was welcomed last week by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

"This man is obviously not a true refugee seeking haven in Canada and deserves to be removed," said community relations chair Hal Joffe in a statement.

CJC said it is "particularly alarming" that Al Husseini testified that Hezbollah operates in Canada.

"CJC urges the solicitor-general to initiate and publish a comprehensive CSIS investigation into the presence, strength and activities of Hezbollah in Canada," Joffe said.

Reich slams Shamir's attack on peace plan

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The former head of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations says it was ill-advised for former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir, during a recent visit to the United States, to call on the Jewish community to openly oppose the Labor-led peace process.

"This is not the Shamir I knew," said Seymour Reich, addressing the annual Canadian Zionist Federation-eastern region (CZF) Israel seminar at the Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue.

It was Shamir, noted Reich, now the president of the American Zionist Movement, who during Likud's tenure led the rallying cry for Diaspora Jewry to show public support for Israeli policies.

"If it was wrong then [to criticize Israel publicly], it is wrong now," Reich told an audience of about 150 who braved record low temperatures to attend the all-day seminar. "I submit that it was not healthy for Shamir to come and openly oppose the process."

In a sense, Reich said those who used to call for a "unified voice" vis-a-vis Israel have found themselves "hoisted on their own petard."

Reich is bothered by the "confusing signals" coming from Israel on this issue. Deputy Prime Minister Yossi Beilin sees a completely open debate as healthy, but Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has asked for a "unified voice."

In Reich's view Beilin's intellectual approach "does not take in the real world."

But in other cases, he suggested, the debate is getting out of hand.

Reich mentioned specifically the recent planting of bombs by Jewish extremists at Jewish organizations in New York as acts that must "clearly be condemned."

Those on the right, in particular, "have an obligation to denounce it."

The escalation of violence by Palestinian and Jewish rejectionists in the territories is also cause for concern, although he said there is no "equation" to be drawn between the two since the vast majority of Jewish protests have been in reaction to Palestinian attacks.

Incidents such as outright murders of Arabs by extremist Jews have mercifully been rare, Reich said.

The situation of the peace process is in such a state of constant flux that it is virtually impossible to make predictions, he said.

But to be sure, "the devil is in the details."

Four months since the signing of the Israeli-PLO Declaration of Principles (DOP), the euphoria has all but shrunk away, as has, at least for the time being, majority Israeli support for the process in the wake of widening violence, said Reich.

United Jewish Appeal leaders in the United States are no longer talking about fundraising for Palestinians, he said.

Israeli leaders are willing to let DOP Israeli withdrawal deadlines expire if security worries are not addressed, and this is proper since "security is the paramount issue, not dates," Reich said.

Reich, however, was critical of Ezer Weizman for not leaving Israel even once since he became president to meet with the Diaspora and talk about the new relationship to be forged as the forces for peace seek to prevail.

Weizman had told him that if the Diaspora wants to see him they should make aliyah.

"But I told him it is not enough to serve tea to visitors. There has to be a debate about this relationship."

In Reich's view, the need for a continuing "partnership" will be just as great despite some in Israel who claim Israel "no longer needs Diasporan support" and an overall "rethinking" taking place over the Israel-Diaspora relationship.

Israel's centrality and Israeli advocacy has to be reaffirmed and discussed, as does the Jewish state's future as a source for investment in a potential era of peace, as the context of the current crisis of continuity confronts the Jewish world.

"We have to face the tachlitic (substantive) issues of the day," Reich said.

Fielding questions later from the audience, Reich said there exists a "grave issue of civil disorder" in Israel resulting from implementing the terms of the DOP.

But he did not consider a "unity" government with Likud a realistic prospect. The Jewish democracy is "hanging by a thread," he said, as it tries to reconcile poles-apart visions of peace.

Reich said it should be remembered that depite accusations that Labor reversed its policy after being elected to talk to the PLO, it is a reality of political life that "governments change their views as developments change."

In fact, Reich said, when the peace talks first began in Madrid while Likud was in power, it was that government that "opened the door" to talks with the PLO since it knew the Palestinian negotiators were taking their orders directly from the organization.

So "who's fooling who?," Reich asked.

The CZF seminar was co-sponsored by Canada Israel-Committee (Quebec region), the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research, Jewish National Fund, and the synagogue's Men's Association.

BBC backs Liberal fight against racism

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) has responded to last week's Speech from the Throne in a letter to Prime Minister Jean Chretien from Frank Dimant, executive vice-president, BBC. In the letter, Dimant expressed support for the Liberal government's commitment to fighting racism and hate crimes.

"We were pleased to note that Justice Minister Allan Rock, in a later statement, raised the possibility of introducing sentencing enhancement for racially motivated crime," Dimant wrote. "Sentencing enhancement is among the many steps that we have urged government to adopt in the fight against hatemongers, including the creation of a Joint Forces Operation between various law enforcement and government agencies."

BBC's League for Human Rights will be holding a hate crimes symposium in Toronto in June, Dimant advised Chretien. The symposium will include police and government representatives, in the hope of facilitating partnership.

The league has monitored right-wing extremism, hate group activity and racially motivated crime in Canada for over 30 years. "We have worked closely with various government and law enforcement agencies to provide information and to develop education and training guidelines and programs in the areas of race relations and hate/bias crime," Dimant said in a news release.

"The government's announced support for the Court Challenges program [which provides funding for court challenges under the Charter of Rights] and the introduction of new measures to combat racism and hate crimes are both timely and commendable," said Stephen Scheinberg, national chair of the league.

Vancouver federation founder gets Order of Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

VANCOUVER — Vancouver lawyer Arthur Fouks, known to many as the founding father of the Jewish Federation of Vancouver, was recently named a member of the Order of Canada.

The Order was established in 1967 to recognize outstanding achievement and service. Governor General Ramon Hnatyshyn will present the insignia of the Order to this year's 80 recipients in a ceremony to be held at his official residence, Ottawa's Rideau Hall.

Fouks received his honor in the philanthropy category. "He has vigorously garnered support for and championed initiatives in health care, education, the arts and the community. The University of British Columbia and its Health Sciences Centre figure prominently on the lengthy list of organizations that have benefited from his involvement," reads a release from Hnatyshyn's office.

Arthur Fouks

When he received an honorary Doctorate of Laws from UBC, his undergraduate and law school alma mater, in 1977, the citation read, "Few can know what he did for the university behind the scenes in its relationship with the public and with the Government. And few are aware of his generosity to the university."

Fouks received a second honorary doctorate in 1989 from Simon Fraser University, with which he also has a long history of involvement, dating back to its establishment in 1965.

Fouks' fundraising and organizational skills have assisted institutions such as Vancouver General Hospital, where he was instrumental in raising money to buy its first brain scanner and to build its $6 million eye care centre.

Fouks also assisted in organizing the Myasthenia Gravis Foundation of B.C., the Elizabeth Fry Association and the B.C. Association for the Mentally Handicapped. He played a major role in raising building funds for Children's Family House of B.C., which houses families of hospitalized children.

An associate counsel at Ray, Connell, Barristers and Solicitors, Fouks' career over the past 45 years has included 12 years as vice-president and director of the Bank of British Columbia (1973-1985). He has held a number of other prominent positions in the business community.

Active community member

Fouks' philosophy is to "give back to society what you take out of it." In the Jewish community alone, he founded the Vancouver Young Jewish Leadership Group, which he still serves in an advisory capacity, and the Jewish Federation of Vancouver, of which he is a board member; has served as vice-president of Vancouver's Jewish Community Centre; chaired two United Jewish Appeal emergency campaigns; and raised money to restore the historic Congregation Emanuel synagogue in Victoria. He is a former executive member of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews (Pacific Division).

A longtime member of the Confratellanza Italo-Canadese, Fouks was also a founding member of the Canadian Council for Native Business, a charitable organization to assist Native businesses.

Other beneficiaries of Fouks' generosity and interest include Arts Umbrella, a non-profit organization to facilitate the teaching of the arts to children; Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University; the B.C./Yukon Heart Foundation; Canada Park in Israel; and Boys Town Jerusalem, a vocational school for disadvantaged boys.

Fouks is "a tremendous philanthropist and highly regarded visionary. He does things for all the right reasons," said Drew Staffenberg, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Vancouver.

Skinheads ordered to view film

LOS ANGELES (JTA) — Two Southern California skinhead leaders who had plotted to start a race war were sentenced last week to prison terms, after undergoing a sensitivity program that included viewing the film Schindler's List.

Christopher Fisher, 20, leader of the self-described Fourth Reich Skinheads, was sentenced to eight years and one month in prison. His co-defendant, Carl Daniel Boese, 17, received a sentence of four years and nine months. Both had pleaded guilty to reduced charges of making and using explosives for criminal purposes.

The two were arrested in July as part of a widely publicized sweep of white supremacists in Southern California. The sweep also netted a half-dozen members of two other racist groups, the White Aryan Resistance and the Church of the Creator, a pseudo-Christian sect which preaches that blacks, Jews and others are evil.

After an 18-month surveillance by the FBI that included infiltrating the skinhead group, the subjects were arrested in time to prevent enacting of the first part of Fisher's plan, which was to kill Rodney King, the black motorist whose beating by white police officers and the policemen's subsequent acquittals incited mass riots in Los Angeles.

The racists' plot included blowing up a landmark black church and machine-gunning its congregation, and sending letter bombs to prominent Jews in Orange County, south of Los Angeles.

Fisher admitted that he and his followers had vandalized a synagogue in the town of Westminster and bombed two houses and a car. No one was injured in the attacks.

As part of plea bargains by Fisher and Boese, the chief federal prosecutor, Marc Greenberg, proposed that they and 10 teen-age white supremacists be exposed to a three-day program of counseling and discussions, primarily at the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles but also with representatives of the American Jewish Committee.

As part of the program, the skinheads talked with Holocaust survivors, met with rabbis and black ministers, held discussions with teenagers from minority groups and viewed Schindler's List, Steven Spielberg's Holocaust epic.

The skinheads also met with convicted murderers and other inmates at the Men's Central Jail in Los Angeles, an experience that seemed to have made the strongest impression on the group.

Results of the novel experiment, which was reported at length on the front pages of The New York Times and The Los Angeles Times, are not yet apparent or clear-cut.

Some of the youngsters seemed to show genuine contrition, while others remained defiant.

One participant asked if the term "kosher" referred to tainted meat, and questioned how much of the proceeds of a $1 candy bar would go to Jews.

Evaluating the three-day course, Greenberg said, "I don't know if this will work or what kind of impact it will have. But at least we tried."

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Wiesenthal Center, observed that the sentences imposed on Fisher and Boese "sent an important signal to young people who may think it cool to be racists. The signal is that society takes hate crimes very seriously."

During his recent swing through eastern Europe, U.S. President Bill Clinton laid a stone at the Prague grave of Rabbi Judah Loew, the venerated Jewish theologian who, according to legend, created the mythical Golem. [RNS Photo/Reuters].

Arab boycott may be reviewed

WASHINGTON (JTA) — The Arab League is reconsidering elements of the economic boycott of Israel, U.S. Commerce Secretary Ron Brown has announced.

The Arab League's secretary general, Esmat Abdel Meguid, told Brown that, at its next ministerial meeting in March, the league would consider rescinding its so-called secondary and tertiary boycotts, Brown said last Friday in Cairo.

The secondary boycott imposes trading sanctions against companies doing business with Israel. The tertiary boycott, in turn, imposes sanctions on companies that trade with firms that have broken the terms of the secondary boycott.

"I am hopeful that this commitment will result in a decision eliminating the secondary and tertiary boycotts, and I look forward to a day when the boycott, in its entirety, will be ended," Brown said in a statement.

"This is a welcome development for U.S. companies seeking to do business in the region and would have a positive impact on the peace process and stability in the region," he said.

The secretary and Meguid met late Thursday in the Egyptian capital.

Brown was quick to telephone Jewish leaders Friday with news of Meguid's commitment.

Among those contacted were officials of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

During his Middle East trip last week, Brown urged Arab leaders to end the boycott, which has been in effect since before the founding of Israel in 1948 and affects both Israel and companies doing business with Israel.

Changes in school year sought

Fernandes said if Ontario's Education Ministry is going to get involved, "it better be soon."

So far, the only institute of learning to accommodate Rosh Hashanah has been the University of Manitoba, which agreed to delay the beginning of the school year in response to requests from local rabbis and Jewish students and staff (CJN, Jan. 13).

Louis Lenkinski, chair of CJC Ontario's community relations committee, recently wrote to provincial Education Minister Dave Cooke, pointing out the conflict for Jews and asking that boards make appropriate arrangements.

Cooke wrote back, saying Congress should bring the matter to the attention of individual boards.

Lenkinski returned the volley, asking that the minister provide boards with guidelines.

Ed Reed, a spokesman at Ontario's Education Ministry, told The CJN the matter "is a thing we would consider doing a memo on." However, there's been no firm decision on whether to issue one, Reed said.

Ministry guidelines say a school year must start on or after Sept. 1 and end on or before June 30, with at least 190 school days in effect.

Los Angeles earthquake shakes Jewish community

By DAVID MILLER and NAOMI PFEFFERMAN
Special to The CJN

LOS ANGELES — "A dybbuk, full of sound and fury" is how a leading Los Angeles rabbi described last week's deadly earthquake that claimed two Jews in Northridge, among nearly 60 dead, and damaged dozens of synagogues and Jewish institutions.

But, Rabbi Harold Schulweis said, "it was not an act of G-d."

"I think that G-d figures largely in how we respond to the challenge, whether it's sickness, death or any other crisis," declared the spiritual leader of Valley Beth Shalom, a Conservative synagogue in Encino, near the 6.6 magnitude quake's epicentre.

But "it's an immoral theology to put the blame on G-d for this disaster," said Rabbi Schulweis. "When we use our hands and our hearts to help others, that is where we find G-d."

As the dust settled following the earthquake, the most powerful in modern Los Angeles history, members of the Jewish community, like so many others in the ravaged city, began cleaning up, assessing the damage and seeking solace.

The Los Angeles earthquake claimed its first known Jewish victims with the death of David and Cecilia Pressman, members of Temple Ahavat Shalom in Northridge. The couple died in the collapse of the Northridge Meadows apartment complex, which claimed 12 other lives.

At least eight families belonging to Ahavat Shalom were left homeless by the quake.

A number of facilities housing major Jewish institutions also suffered serious damage, as did several prominent synagogues, schools and community centers. Jewish leaders, who battled snarled telephone systems and twisted freeways to organize their response to the quake, said it might take weeks to determine the extent of the wreckage.

The epicentre was in the San Fernando Valley, a region abutting Los Angeles in the northwest. Although the quake affected homes, buildings and freeways throughout the metropolitan area, the severest damage was in the valley, home to 240,000 Jews.

One of the hardest-hit sites was the University of Judaism, located in the Bel Air hills. Damage costs are expected to total at least $1 million and could rise much higher, according to Rabbi Robert Wexler, the school's president.

As students and staff were helping to clean up debris, maintenance crews were boarding up holes where more than 40 plate-glass windows had blown out. Water leakage from the air conditioning had damaged second-floor offices, including precious Judaica books. And 100 feet of stucco and wire had dislodged from the third floor terrace overhang and crashed down to the second-floor terrace below.

"It looks as if a bomb went off," said Rabbi Wexler, who expressed relief that no students or staff were injured during the quake.

Just after the earthquake hit, the 110 students who live in campus dormitories met outside on the basketball court, part of an emergency plan. "It was remarkable how calm they were and how maturely they handled everything," Rabbi Wexler said.

Down the road from the university, Stephen S. Wise Temple also suffered serious damage. The 2,800-member congregation, the city's largest, was without water for several days. Windows broke and ceilings fell in a few rooms; synagogue and day school activities were canceled last week.

Alan Rabish, a rabbi at the synagogue, said he was lurched from sleep in his Sherman Oaks home by a loud rumbling sound that he recognized instantly.

"For the first few seconds I thought it was going to be brief like the others, then it kept going," said Rabbi Rabish. "Then I started hearing dressers and TVs falling around me. I realized this was a whole new ballgame."

Although his house was damaged only slightly in the quake, his composure was more than a little rattled. "We lost a lot of sentimental things, but they are only things," he said. "The shattered nerves are going to be much more difficult to repair."

Another Jewish facility to suffer damage was the 6-year-old Bernard Milken Community Campus, housing the main Jewish agencies for the western San Fernando Valley. The campus, already closed down temporarily to correct serious construction deficiencies, suffered major water damage, fallen ceilings and cracked walls, according to John Fishel, executive vice president of the Los Angeles Jewish Federation and former director of Federation CJA in Montreal.

There was possible structural damage to the Jewish Community Building in west-central Los Angeles. Floors were littered with papers, crockery, photographs and computers.

Steven Windmueller, director of the Jewish Community Relations Committee, reported that several offices were blocked by filing cabinets which had fallen against the doors. "The offices are in total disarray," he said. "Every cabinet, every wall hanging, every piece of paper has moved."

Despite its proximity to the quake's epicentre, the Hillel House at Cal State Northridge escaped relatively unscathed, although the interior was a jumbled mess.

The two campuses of the Jewish Homes for the Aging in Reseda weren't so lucky, according to vice-president Marlene Bane of the Valley Jewish Business Leaders Association, a Homes support group. Although no residents were injured or evacuated, psychologists remained on campus around the clock to minister to the senior citizens. All medical equipment remained functional courtesy of two back-up energy systems.

Over the hill in Pico-Robertson, B'nai David-Judea Congregation executive director Marc Porter Zasada expected silence when he arrived at shul on the Monday morning the quake hit. Instead, he discovered a larger-than-usual morning minyan consisting of congregants who were awakened by the 4:30 a.m. tremor.

Less heartening news awaited him inside the ornate, art deco sanctuary, where chunks of plasterwork fell from the ceiling and cracks appeared in the wallwork pilasters. The 15-foot wooden ark was leaning precariously on its pillars, he said, with the 12 or so Torahs jumbled up inside.

Despite the damage, there was surprisingly little looting and other crime. In contrast to the riots that rocked the city in May 1992, people showed an unexpected desire to help one another, said Rabbi Gary Greenebaum, who toured the worst areas of quake damage in his role as president of the Los Angeles Police Commission.

By midweek, Jewish organizations were scrambling to coordinate relief efforts around the city. Some funds were set up by various agencies to collect donations.

The Jewish Federation Council and its agencies reactivated the emergency program put in place during the devastating Los Angeles firestorms of early November, including an emergency hotline and provisions for providing food and shelter for the homeless.

Fishel said the Jewish community was "up to the task" of rebuilding. "We have a very large community system that is highly committed and we know what we're doing."

Jewish organizations have been deluged with telephone calls from around the country, with callers wanting to know how they can help the victims of the earthquake that devastated the Los Angeles area last Monday.

As a result, Jews have a broad choice of groups to which they can donate disaster relief.

"The response has been very positive, but it is still early to tell how much money we will collect," said Jean Bowdish, administrative assistant for the Social Action Commission of the Union of Hebrew American Congregations.

Donations can be sent to UAHC Commission on Social Action, 838 Fifth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10021.

The Conservative movement's disaster relief fund is centered at United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, 155 Fifth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10010, U.S.A..

Relief funds can also be sent to the Union of American Orthodox Congregations, Emergency Earthquake Campaign, 333 Seventh Ave., New York, N.Y. 10001, U.S.A..

The American Jewish World Service, judging from the volume of calls, expects to collect more than $50,000.

The organization, which in the past collected donations to help victims of an earthquake in India, reported that response is greater now, perhaps because many people have friends or relatives in the Los Angeles area.

AJWS's address is 15 W. 26th St., New York, N.Y. 10010.

The Council of Jewish Federations has also set up a relief fund: CJF Earthquake Emergency Fund, 730 Broadway, New York, N.Y. 10003, U.S.A.

B'nai B'rith International is collecting contributions, which can be sent to the B'nai B'rith Disaster Relief Fund at 1640 Rhode Island Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036, U.S.A.

Canadian communal workers return from L.A. disaster

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Five Canadian Jewish communal workers were in Los Angeles during the earthquake. All are safe and sound back on terra firma.

Jay Brodbar and Jeremy Cohen, planners with the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, joined federation staffers Maxine Finkelstein from Montreal, Jean Gerber from Vancouver and Lorraine Bentley from Winnipeg for the 1994 Federation Planners Institute, held in Los Angeles this month.

About 50 communal planners from across North America were there.

Cohen and Brodbar stayed at a Hilton hotel in Universal City, only miles from the quake's epicentre.

The two shared a room and at 4:30 a.m. local time on the 17th, "Jay woke me up and said, 'Jer, I think it's an earthquake,' " Cohen told The CJN.

"My bed moved back and forth and I heard glass breaking and metal bending and grinding. You could feel the whole building bending one way and then the other. It was terrifying.

"Then, it just stopped. The building's internal alarms and emergency lights came on. We could hear screaming in the halls. My concern was that the whole building would collapse."

Cohen and Brodbar grabbed some clothes and bolted down 16 flights of stairs to the hotel lobby, where guests, many still in night clothes, encountered shattered glass on the floor from a chandelier that had fallen. At the hotel's cafe, falling mirrored ceiling tiles had sliced right through some chairs.

"We went out the front door. I saw orange balls of fire in the distance and heard sirens," recalled Cohen, who said he's still "spooked" by the ordeal.

Hotel personnel eventually brought out blankets and "we all huddled together, making instant friends," remembered Brodbar.

No one was hurt at the hotel, which was built to withstand most earthquakes.

Although shaken up, Cohen and Brodbar ended up staying in Los Angeles until the following night. Delegates attending the conference, which went on as planned, even experienced two more aftershocks.

"The whole room would shake," said Cohen. "People would automatically not sit under the chandeliers."

Beilin rejects need for 'Diaspora charity'

TEL AVIV (JTA) — Israel's Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, known for his penchant for provocation, set off a firestorm of protest here last week when he told an international meeting of Zionist women that Israel has a strong economy and does not need Diaspora charity.

"This is the truth," said Beilin, according to Associated Press reports. "If our economic situation is better than in many of your countries, how can we go on asking for your charity?"

The Isranet news service quoted Beilin as saying "Israel is a rich country, I'm sorry to tell you ... you want me to be the beggar and say we need money for the poor people..."

Beilin made the remarks after a speech to the Women's International Zionist Organization (WIZO), prompting loud protest from delegates.

According to press reports, Beilin subsequently was taken to task by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who defended the role of Diaspora Jewish organizations and their appeals for Israel.

Meanwhile, members of the WZO's executive sharply criticized Beilin's remarks at a meeting, warning they could harm fund raising campaigns for Israel.

"The greatest mistake that Israel can make is to separate Diaspora Jewry from the State of Israel and to callously stop the contribution of Diaspora Jewry to the ingathering of the exiles and the building of the State of Israel," Simcha Dinitz, chair of the Jewish Agency and World Zionist Organization, said in a statement released after the meeting.

"Whoever proposes disturbing the partnership between Israel and the Diaspora does not understand the essence of Zionism, that Israel is not just the country of the Israelis, it is the homeland of the entire Jewish people," Dinitz said.

Those close to Beilin, however, insist he said nothing new. They say he was merely talking about the need to redefine the Israel-Diaspora relationship and has been doing so for a long time.

"But the (WIZO) ladies began to yell at him and didn't want to listen to his message," said a source in Beilin's office who declined to be identified. "There was no dialogue."

Beilin's message, the source said, is that the peace process is beginning to allow Israelis the "luxury" of turning away from all-consuming security matters to raise important cultural and social questions that have been neglected.

"We have to rethink the organization of institutions, whether it's the Histadrut (trade federation), Kupat Holim (national health system) or the Jewish Agency, which began in 1929," he said.

"In 1994, it (the Jewish Agency) should address and redefine its function and objective," the source said.

What concerns Beilin "is the continuity of Jewish life," he said. Beilin wants to shift some of the focus from charity for Israel to investing in the education of Diaspora Jews, for which "entities like the United Jewish Appeal are instrumental."

"That it may be time to change the structure of the UJA is Yossi's point of view, not a fixed policy," the source stressed.

Above all, "he wants debate and dialogue," he said, noting that Beilin just "puts the questions on the table."

Menachem Revivi, director-general of the United Israel Office, which represents United Israel Appeal, the Council of Jewish Federations and UJA in Israel, said he thought Beilin's statement was "very provocative" and not helpful.

"It comes with good intentions" of modernizing long-held traditions, he said, but it also reflects a failure to understand what the philanthropy represents for Diaspora Jews.

"It represents their wish to be connected, to be responsible, to be partners in what is theirs as much as ours," he said.

Revivi said he would welcome the Israeli government taking the initiative to say to the Diaspora that, "after 45 years, we are in a situation where we can rewrite the covenant and set a new agenda for the Jewish people and divide the labor" between Israel and the Diaspora.

But "we do need world Jewry, as much now as in the past," he emphasized. "We are a Jewish state and they are our best allies, as much in peacetime as in war."

Still, Revivi seemed to support one of Beilin's major points.

"Maybe now is the time to see what else should flow into the pipeline," he said. "I agree Israel should (address) its own responsibility for Jewish continuity worldwide."

Beilin's strength, said the source in Beilin's office, is that he "confronts them (Diaspora Jews) with a different reality" that will have to be faced as the younger generation of Israelis rises to positions of leadership.

"Jews and Israelis should sit down and talk about what this (the generational change) means," he said.

Israel, Vatican name envoys

ROME (JTA) — Four weeks after the signing of their mutual recognition agreement, Israel and the Vatican have announced the names of the envoys who will be representing the two states in their first diplomatic ties.

Israel named a veteran diplomat, Shmuel Hadas, to represent the Jewish state in the Vatican.

The same day, Pope John Paul II named Archbishop Andrea di Montezemolo as the Vatican's first envoy to Israel.

The Archbishop will have the title of special representative pending a full exchange of ambassadors, a move expected to occur within a few months.

Montezemolo, 68, has considerable experience in the Middle East. He currently serves as the Holy See's apostolic delegate to Jerusalem and as the apostolic nuncio to Cyprus.

On Dec. 30, Israel and the Vatican signed their historic agreement, opening the way to the establishment of full diplomatic relations.

There were reports that the Vatican had objected to the possible appointment of a rabbi to serve as Israel's first representative to the Holy See.

Reports surfaced in the Italian, American and Israeli media that the Vatican was blocking the appointment of Rabbi David Rosen as Israeli ambassador.

The British-born Rabbi Rosen, a former Chief Rabbi of Ireland, is the Jerusalem-based director of interfaith relations for the Anti-Defamation League (ADL).

Rabbi Rosen was a key negotiator in the talks leading up to the Israeli-Vatican agreement.

Montezemolo had said openly that the first Israeli ambassador to the Holy See should be a career diplomat.

The Vatican stressed that the bilateral agreement is a state-to-state rather than a theological accord.

Harry Wall, the ADL director in Israel, was quoted by as saying the Vatican's stance would suggest "a slight touch of dual standards, since, after all, Vatican representatives abroad are clerics."

In a separate development, Israel appointed its first ambassador of Arab descent last week.

Yussuf Haj-Yihy, a retired judge from the West Bank town of Taiba, was named Israel's new ambassador to Finland.

The Jerusalem Post reported that Haj-Yihy called his appointment "a blessed step toward more Arab intellectuals having high-ranking positions in the state and toward (Israeli Arabs) regaining their rights."

Students defend yeshiva

JERUSALEM (JTA) — Students at a yeshiva at the ancient synagogue north of Jericho said last week they would offer passive resistance to any effort by the army to evacuate the site.

The Israeli military issued orders to vacate the yeshiva immediately for renovations that reportedly were requested by the yeshiva authorities.

But officials with the yeshiva say they suspect the military's real purpose for the evacuation is to shutter the yeshiva, which opened four years ago at the seventh-century Shalom al Yisrael synagogue near Jericho.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

LYATZKOVITCH

Zalman Lyatzkovich, of Toronto, seeks help in solving the "riddle" of his surname. He has not encountered a similar name except once in a subtitle of a Yugoslavian movie.

Lyaskovichi is a tiny village near Pinsk in White Russia. Some authorities attribute the derivation of the name to "Elye" or Eliyahuh (Elijah).

BEIERBACH

Levi Beierbach, of Calgary, has given me a list of 10 names. Some of them like Schneider (tailor), Vogel (bird) and Pfeiffer (whistler) have been considered in earlier columns.

He believes his own name refers to a person who lives near a river, probably because Bach is German for brook or stream.

Actually, his name is a misspelling of Bauerbach, a village 45 kilometres northwest of Stuttgart in Germany.

SHIMKOVITZ

The hard-working Shimkovitz family, which turns out a wide variety of tasty food in its downtown Toronto restaurant, Regions, owes its surname to a Polish shtetl called Siemkovice, not far from Czestochowa in Central Poland.

The Bene Israel of India

A unique story of Jewish survival

By PATRICIA RUCKER
CJN Editor

BOMBAY, India — "Anti-Semitism? No, we have never experienced any problems because we are Jewish — not here in India.

"But I remember when I was studying in the United States. I was told not to say I was a Jew, because it could make difficulties for me. I was told to say simply that I was Indian. I could not understand that."

Dr. Joyce Shankaran is a high-ranking medical official with the government of the Indian state of Maharashtra, whose capital is Bombay. Elegant in a sari, she was one of two score or so prominent Indian Jews who had come to a reception welcoming our group of North American Jews to India.

Nearly half a world away from our homes, we were struggling with jet lag. But the dislocation in time paled in comparison with the dislocation in perception. Accustomed to handling reports of Holocaust revisionism and neo-Nazi resurgence, we were not prepared for a community of Jews who have never experienced anti-Semitism. And they, in turn, did not understand our persistence in verifying that, yes, really, there was no discrimination against Jews in the country in which they have lived for centuries.

The Jews of India have a unique history or, more correctly, histories. They are made up of three distinct communities — Bene Israel, Cochini, and Baghdadi — but what they share is a common experience of acceptance within the embrace of Indian culture.

For millenia, the Indian subcontinent has taken in the diversity of peoples who have flowed across its mountains and plains. The Buddha was born here; the Muslim Moghuls flourished here; the Tibetan Dalai Lama found sanctuary here — the predominant Hindu faith has traditionally accommodated diversity. For the Jews of India, this has been a blessing. For those of us who came from North America to speak with them, and to learn from them, it was a revelation.

North American Jewry is very taken with the issues of continuity these days. With the growing acceptance of Jews into North American society comes a growing intermarriage rate, and a growing fear that our acceptance will inevitably result in our disappearance as a distinct and viable community in North America. The Jews of Bombay, committed to maintaining their identity in the face of diminishing numbers, offer an object lesson in Jewish survival which should be taken to heart by Jews throughout the Diaspora.

* * *

There are an estimated 5,000 Jews in India today, a sharp drop from nearly 30,000 in the middle of the century. (To keep those figures in perspective, the Canadian Jewish population is presently more than 350,000; and the total population of India today is more than 900 million.)

Of those 5,000, nearly all live in the Bombay area, and nearly all are Bene Israel — literally, the children of Israel.

The origins of the Bene Israel are shrouded in mystery. According to one account, their ancestors escaped by sea from Israel in the second century BCE, fleeing persecution by the Hellene tyrant Antiochus Epiphanes (the same against whom the Maccabees revolted.) Shipwrecked off the Konkan coast, just south of Bombay, the 14 survivors — seven men and seven women — took up the trade of oil pressing, produced children, and, lacking Torahs, maintained Jewish belief and practice as best they could.

They said the Shema; circumcised their sons on the eighth day after birth; observed the Sabbath; and differentiated between "clean" and "unclean" fish.

Cut off from the rest of the Jewish world for centuries, they were "discovered," — perhaps as early as 1000 CE, according to Bene Israel tradition — and as we know from written records, by the Jews from Cochin, in the far south of India, in the middle of the 18th century. They absorbed the religious knowledge of the Cochinis, who had never lost touch with Jewish communities in West Asia; learned Hebrew and the Bible from Christian missionaries who arrived with the British East India Company — but spurned any attempts at conversion; enlisted, as Indians, in the (British) Indian army and civil service; and began moving into Bombay City.

By the mid-19th century, they were established as tradesman and clerical workers, and in small numbers in the professions; had built a number of synagogues; and had a well-established communal life centred on Bombay and the northern suburbs of Thane and Pune, although some families remained in the Konkan villages.

When, towards the end of the 18th century, the Baghdadi Jews started to come to India from Syria and Iraq, they at first worshipped with the Bene Israel in Bombay. But they began to regard with suspicion the degree to which the Bene Israel had adopted the local dress and language, Marathi. Questioning the strictness of their observance of Jewish law, particularly in matters of divorce and remarriage, and in some cases even their Jewishness, the Baghdadis refused for decades to worship with the Bene Israel; marriage between the two groups was almost unheard of. (The issue was finally settled, in Israel in 1964, with the full acceptance of Bene Israel as Jews.)

The Bene Israel continued to found their own schools and congregations, including the liberal (i.e., Reform) Jewish Religious Union, initiated by Jerusha Jhirad, the first Indian Jewish woman (in fact, the first Indian woman) to become a doctor, when she returned from interning in London in 1924.

Indian independence in 1947 and the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948 brought about a mass emigration of Indian Jews which in effect has brought the history of the Baghdadi and Cochin communities in India to an end, leaving only the Bombay Bene Israel as a viable Jewish community in India.

But even the Bene Israel are only a fraction of their former size. Like other Jews, and Indians in general, they were seized with the desire to search out a better life overseas, in the United States, Australia, Great Britain or Canada.

But it was the new Jewish state that exerted the strongest pull. When the Jewish Agency arrived with an invitation to the "Ingathering of the Exiles," they responded with enthusiasm, sending even young children on Youth Aliyah, to be joined later by parents and grandparents. Not even the questions of their religious status, nor charges of discrimination against them in Israel, could deter them.

Today, there are an estimated 25,000 to 30,000 Bene Israel in Israel — more than five times as many as remain in India.

The lost Jews of India have returned home.

* * *

For those who remain in Bombay, the distinctions between Baghdadi and Bene Israel have vanished. Building a viable Jewish community is all that matters.

The Sir Jacob Sassoon School is named for the scion of the fabled Baghdadi family of merchant princes who built it in 1903. It sits on the same plot of land as the magnificent Magen David Synagogue, also built by the Sassoons.

When we arrived at the school, which teaches children between the ages of four and 16, it was lunch hour. Those who had finished eating were playing in the small schoolyard,, noisily but without the roughhousing common on North American playgrounds. At the tables, mothers in saris and burkhas (the traditional orthodox Muslim dress worn in India) served hot lunches from multi-layered metal tiffin boxes.

The school is situated in a once-Jewish, now predominantly working-class Muslim area. Of the 700 students, principal Bulboo Sen told us, only about ten per cent are Jewish. The majority of the rest are Muslim from the neighborhood. All attend the daily religious assembly, but those who do not wish to join in the Hebrew prayers are not required to. The school is closed on Shabbat and all Jewish holidays.

Sen has been principal of the academy for more than 20 years. She is proud of her students, and very aware of the sacrifices their parents have made to send them to a private school. "All the children are doing better than their parents. That is what you educate them for."

The Hebrew studies principal, Rabbi Abraham Benjamin, acknowledges that the Hebrew education is not as intense. Basic Jewish religious knowledge is taught one hour a day, and in the higher classes, the weekly Torah portion. "If you would like to help us," Rabbi Abraham asks, "send us Jewish books."

Elijah Jacob, an energetic, intense 33-year-old with a Masters degree in chemical technology and an MBA, is country representative for the Indian office of the Jewish Joint Distribution Campaign. He left a successful career in industry, he said, "because I was making my company wealthy. I realized that if I could direct my efforts and see that the community benefits from what I do, it would be much more satisfying."

He believes that the local community has not only stabilized, but is growing, and expects a population of 6,500 to show up in the 1996 census.

Under the chairmanship of the distinguished English-language Jewish poet Prof. Nissim Ezekiel, the JDC has focussed on assistance to poor Jews, aiding about 100 families per month.

It maintains an old age home with 12 elderly residents, and a home for six Jewish orphans from the villages who lost their parents in the recent monsoon floods. A seventh lives with his grandmother in the old age home.

The other priority of the JDC is fostering Jewish identity among young people. Ezekiel displays the Rosh Hashanah edition of Kol Bombay, packed with puzzles, contests and crafts, information on Jewish holidays and history, and even "Hebrews' Humour," (from Talmud Berachot).

He lists his goals: that Shabbat will be celebrated in every Jewish home; that there will be a minyan in each and every synagogue; that there will be an Indian-born rabbi and (with a grin) a Jewish prime minister.

How did the Bene Israel survive as Jews through the generations of their isolation?

It is too simple to say that the Hindu caste system prevented assimilation and encouraged separateness. It may have been a factor — but Christian attempts at conversion were, to the chagrin of the missionaries, politely but universally rebuffed.

They had no need to band together in self-defence against a hostile society. Nor did they develop elaborate communal institutions until comparatively recently, when they moved into urban areas.

What appears to have kept the Jewish spirit alive in the Bene Israel is their devotion to their faith.

What they knew, they held to, even though they thought they were the only Jews in the world. And when they learned that they were not, they returned, eagerly and joyously, to the congregation of Israel.

Elijah Jacob told us that in India, "Jews are looked on as very special."

They are.

The News in Brief

MiA's Parents to Visit

OTTAWA — The parents of missing Israeli soldier Zacharia Baumel will be in Ottawa Feb. 6 and 7 to meet with government officials and bolster Western support for the search for all four Israeli MiAs. Yona and Miriam Baumel left last week for the United States, where they will appear at rallies on college campuses and meet officials. Israel's Embassy here could not be more specific about the Baumels' plans. The families of the missing servicemen are taking advantage of the upsurge in interest in Syria's role in the peace talks and are launching publicity campaigns abroad. Following the recent summit in Geneva between U.S. President Bill Clinton and Syrian leader Hafez al-Assad, Yona Baumel said he hoped there would be some mention of the MiAs, "but we are very practical." Zacharia Baumel went missing in the 1982 battle of Sultan Yakub in Lebanon. A U.S. Congessional mission is investigating the fate of the four servicemen.

UNIFIL Drops Complaint

TEL AVIV — A Finnish soldier serving with the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon was slightly wounded last week when the UNIFIL post north of the southern Lebanon security zone came under shelling. UNIFIL filed a complaint against Israel but then retracted it when it learned the shell that hit the soldier had been fired by the South Lebanon Army, Israel's ally, and not by the Israel Defence Force. The attack caused extensive damage to the post. The incident occurred after a roadside bomb attack against an SLA patrol, in which an SLA soldier was slightly wounded. The Believers Resistance, a radical Shi'ite organization that broke away from the Amal Shi'ite movement several years ago, claimed responsibility for the attack against the SLA unit. UNIFIL has lost 195 soldiers since deploying peacekeeping forces in southern Lebanon in 1978. The U.N. force currently has about 5,400 troops operating in the region.

Undercover Work Continues

JERUSALEM — The IDF's Duvdevan undercover unit has not decreased its activity since the signing of the agreement with the PLO, the unit's commander, said in a report in the latest issue of the army magazine Bamahane. The commander also insisted there's no doubt about the unit's continued existence, noting that in the past, more operations were conducted by agents in civilian dress, while now more are commando-style. "It's clear that the hunt for wanted fugitives must continue," the commander said. "Since the [PLO-Israel] agreement was signed, the fugitives have become more motivated, bolder. They are now acting both at night and during the day, and against both soldiers and settlers. In the last year, Duvdevan has apprehended 72 fugitives."

Holocaust Artifacts Handed Over

SYDNEY — A well-worn boot, items of jewelry and reconstructed skull fragments were at the center of a unique presentation at the Sydney Jewish Museum this month. With the dissolution of the war crimes investigatory unit by the Australian government due to be completed by the end of January, the Australian Archives gave, in perpetuity, photographs of and items exhumed from the mass graves of Jews of the villages of Gnivan and Serniki, in the Ukraine. The exhumations and subsequent reburials in accordance with Jewish law were part of the Australian government's investigation of allegations that people who found haven in Australia had been involved in the murders of the Jewish villagers more than 50 years ago. It was part of a series of scientific and historical investigations conducted by the Special Investigations Unit, which provided grim physical proof of the brutality of the Nazi murder machine.

Italy Backtracks on Election

ROME — Confronted by widespread protests over its decision to schedule crucial general elections on the first day of Passover, Italy's caretaker government has backtracked and put together an emergency decree that will enable observant Jews to vote. The decree, which was expected to be enacted after approval by both houses of a parliament that was formally dissolved last week, will extend the duration of the elections to two days. This will allow voters to go to the polls until 10 p.m. on March 28, two and a half hours after sundown on the second day of Passover. Jews and their supporters expressed satisfaction with the latest developments, although the entire affair has left a lingering bad taste.

Georgia Backtracks Too

TBLISHI — The government of the former Soviet republic of Georgia has backtracked on its effort to tax Jews leaving the country. Early this month, the Georgian government announced that passports, previously issued for a nominal charge, would cost $300, which is equivalent to several years' salary in Georgian currency. The Jewish Agency for Israel, which maintains an office here in the Georgian capital, attributed the measure to a desire for foreign currency, on the assumption that world Jewry would pay for the passports. President Eduard Shevardnadze said he had not known of the measure in advance and told the Jewish Agency he would cancel it. Now, it is reported that there may be a $50 passport fee.

Jews, Rightists Hold Gatherings

BUDAPEST — Large crowds gathered here last week to commemorate the 49th anniversary of the liberation of the Budapest Ghetto. Members of the Jewish community, together with high-ranking Hungarian politicians, gathered to remember the actions of the Soviet Red Army, which liberated the ghetto on Jan. 18, 1945. As well, a candlelight ceremony was held in memory of Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who saved the lives of 100,000 Hungarian Jews during World War II. Meanwhile, right-wing elements held a gathering of their own in an outer district of the Hungarian capital. Dozens of people gathered to hear nationalistic and anti-Semitic speeches. The extremists vowed to hold such meetings every week.

Number of Soldiers Killed Doubles

JERUSALEM — The number of soldiers killed in action doubled for the second year in a row, Maj.-Gen. Yoram Yair, head of the IDF's manpower branch, told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee last week. The number of soldiers who died in accidents of all kinds, however, dropped from 37 in 1992 to 17 in 1993. For the first time in IDF history, there were no fatalities in training accidents. Yair explained that increased terrorist activity led to the death of 45 soldiers in southern Lebanon, Judea, Samaria, and Gaza last year, up from 24 in 1992 and 11 in 1991. Twenty-six soldiers died in southern Lebanon and 19 in the territories. Seven soldiers died in traffic accidents involving military vehicles in 1993, compared with 11 in 1992 and 14 in 1991. Three died in accidents involving weapons and ammunition dropped, compared to five in each of the two previous years. Five soldiers died in accidents during military operations; one was electrocuted; and another died in a work accident. Thirty-eight soldiers committed suicide, including 31 conscripts, four in the regular army, and three reservists. Nine of the 31 conscripts who killed themselves were immigrants. According to Yair, the number of suicides was about the same as in previous years, but constituted a relative decrease since the total number of men and women in uniform was larger. The army found that only two of the 31 conscript suicides were related to military service; in one of the cases, a soldier killed himself after being harassed by his commander. All of the new immigrant suicides were linked to absorption difficulties, army investigators found. According to Yair, 30 soldiers died in non-military traffic accidents last year, compared to 34 in 1992 and 28 in 1991.

Cabinet OK's Airport Plan

JERUSALEM — Israel's cabinet last week approved Transport Minister Yisrael Kessar's plan for the construction of a new terminal at Ben-Gurion Airport at a cost of some $850 million. Agriculture Minister Ya'acov Tsur was the only minister who objected to the plan, arguing that too much land would be needed for the project. Kessar said the new terminal should be given the highest priority, as it would increase the speed with which passengers could transit the airport. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said he would do his best to expedite the project so it could be ready by the country's 50th anniversary in 1998.

TU BiSHEVAT 1994/5754 • THE NEW YEAR OF TREES

During Israel's "Year of the Environment" and during this special "Shmittah" year, plant trees for the future!

קרן קימת לישראל

TU BiSHEVAT, the 15th day of the Hebrew month of Shevat has been celebrated as The New Year of Trees for many centuries by Jews around the world. The way in which to celebrate this holiday has been traditionally the planting of trees in Israel.

So, in recent times, TU BiSHEVAT has become known all over Israel as THE JNF HOLIDAY, since the Jewish National Fund organizes thousands of tree-plantings over the length and breadth of Israel on that day.

YOU CAN PLANT TREES IN ISRAEL with the help of JNF. Clip and mail the attached form to us and JNF will plant your trees for you.

You can celebrate TU BiSHEVAT by planting trees for yourself, your family and your friends. You thereby establish a link with the land and the people of Israel which continues to grow, which makes Israel green and beautiful, which protects the soil and which preserves the environment.

Trees are symbols - of hope, of beauty, of strength, of strong roots, of the future, of love and of a bond with the soil and the sky of Israel.

CELEBRATE TU BiSHEVAT BY THE PLANTING OF TREES. SEND YOUR MESSAGE OF LOVE TO THE PEOPLE OF ISRAEL! SAY IT WITH TREES!

Assad in Geneva: no breakthrough, but a new start

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

The Clinton-Assad meeting in Geneva was well-prepared in advance and produced the modest results, described by U.S. President Bill Clinton as "having brought the goal of peace closer." To understand what happened behind the closed doors during the nearly five hours of discussions, one should consider the state of mind and the motivations of the two participants and pay careful attention to the atmosphere as well as the public statements of their joint press-conference.

Leaving his own problems at home, Clinton had gone to Geneva after a tour of European capitals where most of the vital issues he addressed were left basically unsettled. In Moscow, he signed an important denuclearization agreement with the presidents of Russia and the Ukraine, the smooth implementation of which is all but certain. He also assured Boris Yeltsin of his unwavering assistance and friendship, but left him insecure at the helm of his very troubled country, with his reform policy in shambles. Rarely in the history of U.S. leadership has such a marathon been undertaken. In a world freed of the familiar dangers of the cold war, but unable to handle its current economic and social difficulties, the outbreaks of wild nationalism come at a time when, because of its diminished political clout and limited financial means, the one remaining superpower can do little to help.

But everything is relative. Compared to all the festering conflicts on the world scene, tackling the Middle Eastern conflict seems somewhat more promising. This is why, after a frustrating week spent in the vicinity of the unstoppable bloodshed in former Yugoslavia and in the middle of the unfinished drama of the once mighty Soviet Union, the Clinton team must have approached the meeting with the inscrutable Syrian leader with the feeling that a serious attempt to revitalize the stalled Middle East peace process should now be made.

Yeshayahu Anug

For President Hafez al-Assad, the aging ruler of a country in trouble for having lost its political, economic and military anchors with the disintegration of the Soviet Union, the chance to improve relations with the U.S. and the West, has become the first priority. In the past two years, despite his having agreed to participate in the Madrid peace conference, Assad had been ambiguous in making his intentions known. By allowing a number of terrorist organizations to maintain their headquarters in Damascus and by facilitating Hezbollah activity in Southern Lebanon at the embarrassing and high cost of remaining listed as a terrorist country, Syria had established its role as a potential spoiler of any solutions that were not to its liking.

The secretly negotiated Israel-PLO accord took Assad by surprise and injured his pride. When the peace talks with Syria were relegated to secondary priority by Rabin, with the temporary acquiescence of the U.S., Assad, who regards his country as the pillar of the Arab world, managed to prove in South Lebanon that he can not be ignored. He proved it twice: first by heating up the area and then by cooling it off completely, shortly before going to Geneva.

He must have reluctantly come to the conclusion that there was no direct ticket to the heart of Washington and that pacification with Jerusalem was the passport to rehabilitation. Though he refuses to settle with the Israelis for less than Anwar al-Sadat got from them, he cannot produce the same kind of positive psychological shock that helped Sadat so much in changing the mood of Israel almost overnight. He stammered publicly in Geneva when asked what he meant by full peace in exchange for full withdrawal, and left it to Clinton to spell out what he had presumably hinted at in private.

Yes, the ball is now in Rabin's court, but it is a ball that Rabin can handle slowly and carefully. Israel's prime minister said repeatedly that the degree of withdrawal "on the Golan" will be in proportion to the degree of peace available; he never said that full peace will lead to full withdrawal. He is not going to be more explicit now.

So there was no spectacular breakthrough in Geneva, not even in the Syrian-U.S. relationship, more pressing for Assad than the Golan Heights. There was only a decision to "examine jointly" the various components of the problem - very much like the prescription for progress in Israel-Syrian relations, where the talks to be resumed this week in Washington, after a hiatus of four months, will, in President Clinton's words, have "to relate withdrawal to the issues of peace and security."

More must have been said during the face-to-face meeting in Geneva than was reflected by the press conference, which for the Syrian dictator must have been an unusual experience. But the picture is not all that obscure. We face a new beginning with more American involvement than before. This leads to the question of how important it will be for the Clinton administration to energetically pursue the goal and how crucial (and rewarding) it will be for both Syria and Israel to co-operate with the Americans.

In Israel, the hopes and fears related to the controversial Golan issue will dominate the scene in the days and weeks to come, and lead to bitter confrontations between the various political groups and to renewed tests of the government's stability. To handle the new situation, Rabin is now floating the controversial idea of a popular referendum to be held if the negotiations with Syria show "that the demanded territorial cost will be significant." Since no referendum has ever been held in Israel, special legislation would be required, and it is doubtful whether it will come to that. But by launching this trial balloon Rabin is confusing his opponents at home who can not possibly come out against "consulting the people" whom they claim to represent.

In conclusion: As Assad did not commit himself to expell the various terrorist groups that operate from Damascus immediately, Syria remains on the list of pariah countries for the time being. Although he spoke of a strategic decision to make peace with Israel, he missed the opportunity to break the psychological barrier between the two countries.

Geneva did, however, reopen the road to bilateral negotiations and with the U.S. looking over their shoulders, the negotiators could well achieve some results. Bearing in mind that both Clinton and Assad have talked persistently of 1994 as of the year of peace, one should not dismiss this possibility out of hand.

Yemenites in Israel face a difficult transition

By LARRY YUDELSON

Yosef Keim does not want his complaints to dissuade anyone — including his relatives still in Yemen — from joining him in Israel.

"Everyone has to come," he insists, as God is fulfilling the promise to gather the exiles from all over the Earth.

But nonetheless Keim has harsh words about his new home, and his complaints echo those of other recent Yemenite immigrants.

Some even speak of returning to the Arab country where they were kept isolated from the outside world for 40 years.

In the past year, half of the Jewish community of Yemen has departed, and the rest are expected to follow.

This was the first major emigration since 1954, although some Jews were able to sneak out in 1962 during the chaos of the civil war between North and South Yemen.

In the past three years, the newly unified Yemenite government has followed a relatively liberal course, which includes the right of Jews to leave.

The Yemenites have faced a profoundly difficult transition.

It is a transition from a way of life that has changed little in the past 2,000 years to a modern society where daily life involves mortgage payments, electric bills and jobs that do not allow for the traditional mid-afternoon siesta.

Unlike the 45,000 Yemenites who arrived in Israel in 1949 and 1950, these newcomers are not being housed in tents, nor are they having their side curls shorn.

They are being housed initially in Jewish Agency absorption centers, alongside immigrants from Ethiopia and elsewhere.

But they remain distinctive.

At an absorption center in Ashkelon, Yemenite men crouch on a ledge bordering the sidewalk.

Next to them, women sit separately, their long-sleeved dresses, resplendent in rich blues and greens, distinctively Yemenite. Little girls play in long skirts and pantaloons.

"The broad majority are extremely happy, and you can see that in people continuing to leave Yemen," said an American familiar with the Yemenite immigrants.

"You can find people among any immigrant group...who have high expectations and who are disappointed," the American added.

Count among the disappointed several immigrants at an absorption center in Rehovot.

"We are not like the Russian Jews who come with one child and one dog," an exasperated immigrant told a group of Americans visiting from the United Jewish Appeal recently.

"We have 11 children. We were jewelry makers in Yemen, but we tried it in Israel, and it didn't work out," he said.

A traditional Yemenite Jew.

"Now we have to learn another job. We have problems. We can't speak Hebrew, to write and to read. We don't have a profession."

And, in fact, some have two wives.

Should they thank the government for providing two very generous mortgages to buy two apartments for them?

Or should they curse the two bills they get each month?

"Electricity, rent, health insurance, rent, telephone, everything," said Amriyom Barhiali, counting off on his fingers the bills that keep coming in.

"I have nothing. I have nothing to eat. Eight months I've been here. I have no food. What to eat? How will I make money? I have family in Yemen, an auto, money, it's true. Now I don't have anything," said Barhiali, a middle-aged man with a thin, expressive face and long side curls.

He went to the Interior Ministry to apply for a passport to return to Yemen. They sent him a bill for 1,300 shekels — to repay roughly $500 (U.S.) in government assistance to help him settle.

"I don't have the money to pay the government," he complained.

According to a report in Yediot Achronot, one family at the Rehovot absorption centre has already left Israel, and five more are planning to follow.

The families were convinced to leave Israel by anti-Zionist Satmar Chassidim and are relocating to Brooklyn, the newspaper reported.

Numerous Satmar Chassidim have visited Yemen over the years and tried to convince the Jews there to stay.

In Yemen, most of the Jews were silversmiths. Their craftsmanship was renowned, and with their departure, some of the sparkle has gone from the Yemenite markets.

But in Israel, they find they can no longer sell their wares to tourists or others willing to pay high prices.

And the bills keep piling up.

"In Yemen, you can get by working only two days a week," said one woman who works with the Yemenites in the Rehovot absorption centre, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"You sell one piece of jewelry and can go home. They never learned about time, about sitting in school," she said.

"Now they come here and we say, 'You have to go to work.' He finds work, and says, 'What, do you think I'm a slave? They won't let me smoke, want me to work 10 hours a day.' "

Arnon Mantver, director-general of the Jewish Agency's aliyah and absorption department, says the Yemenite Jews are being well taken care of.

"They will realize that this system is more supportive than in Yemen. There is social security that takes into account their situation," he said.

"If they won't be spoiled by different groups who try to intervene, they will fit in very well," he said

Other veteran Israelis also give short shrift to the Yemenites' complaints.

"When they came in 1949, my family had a very hard absorption," said one woman of Yemenite origin who works with the new immigrants. "They had no houses, only tents. When it rained, it came in. The wind blew, and whoop! There went the tent!"

But that is not how the newcomers see it.

"When they came, you could just throw a stone and claim the land. Today you have to pay 200 shekels for a $50,000 mortgage," complained one.

A look at those numbers — less than $70 monthly payments for a $50,000 apartment — and it is clear that the Yemenites are being heavily subsidized by the government.

And it is also clear that they do not fully understand the society they have entered.

For Keim, the biggest shock is religious and political.

"The laws here aren't good," he said. "The prime minister is no good."

Keim's complaint was that Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin shook hands with PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat, Arabs are killing Jews with abandon, and he, a Jew, had to surrender his own weapons when he immigrated.

"In Yemen I had a knife, I had a pistol," he said.

Even the religious situation is confusing.

"I can't tell a Jew from an Arab," Keim said. The Jews in Israel, he said, do not wear yarmulkes or side curls.

Keim finds little solace in the mantra often told to new immigrants: savlanut — patience.

But the woman at the absorption centre thinks patience will be rewarded for the new Israelis from Yemen.

"I believe they will manage here in Israel," she said. "They live real life. They're street-smart." (JTA)

Trees, please

Today we celebrate Tu b'Shevat, the New Year of Trees. This calendar year, 1994, is the Year of the Environment in Israel and therefore Tu b'Shevat has a very special meaning for all of us at this particular time.

We think of ecology as a 20th century concern, largely developed from the stresses our civilization has put on the natural world.

In our puny response to the increasingly frightening technology of today and the fears people harbor over the plight of the earth, we as Jews recognize the warnings contained within our Judaic tradition for hundreds of years.

Tu b'Shevat is one of those observances which goes unnoticed by most of our people. This is regrettable, because it is the celebration of the fact that ecology, the newly discovered cause of so many of our young people, is a Jewish cause, if not a Jewish word.

Our agrarian ancestors made many references to trees and plants. They spoke of the righteous man being like the tree planted near the water, with roots growing deep into the soil for stability.

The Torah instructed the people that even during warfare, fruit trees were not to be cut down to make weapons. The Torah also instructed that we were to ignore the fruit crops of the first few years, giving the trees a chance to grow to maturity.

When Jews began to return to the Promised Land at the end of the 19th century, they planted trees to combat the swamps and erosion which had taken over the land. By destroying the trees, those who had conquered the promised land over the centuries had rendered it almost incapable of supporting human habitation.

Only the Jews, after all those years, made any effort to plant trees and give the land stability. We are told that when Theodore Herzl visited Eretz Israel, he planted a tree to signal the beginning of Zionist development. Since that time, the Jewish National Fund has planted more than 200 million trees to benefit the new inhabitants.

How important is it to plant a tree? Our sages of old said that if one is planting a tree, and the Messiah should suddenly appear, the planting was not to be interrupted. One should finish the planting, then turn to the Messiah. He will understand, for trees are life itself.

For most Canadians, it's not physically possible to plant a tree in Israel on Tu b'Shevat. However, we have a shaliach — the local office of the Jewish National Fund. When we plant trees in Israel, we are making a statement of support for the people of Israel and of love for the land of Israel, ensuring beauty, strength, and a clean environment — and symbolizing our hope for a peace with strong roots.

Celebrate Tu b'Shevat 1994 by planting your trees.

Pathways to peace

Shimon Peres, Israel's foreign minister, spoke for a lot of people when he said in reaction to Hafez al-Assad's recent statements in Geneva that the details of the Syrian's dictator's "peace" offer are "pretty foggy." Moreover, Assad neglected, in his talks with U.S. President Bill Clinton, to specify what Syria meant by normalization of relations with Israel.

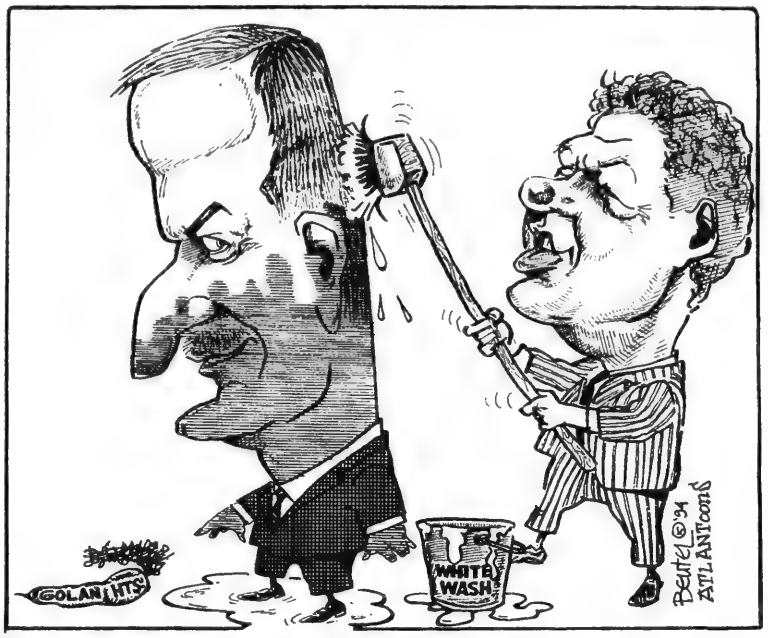
In fact, except for one minor note, the Syrian president repeated, robot-like, the demands that his regime have made habitually since the abortive 1973 Syrian-Egyptian attack on Israel — that Israel withdraw from all Arab lands. Those demands, reiterated with nauseous regularity even before 1973 (they go back to 1948 and Israel's victory in the War of Independence), have always been the major stumbling block to peace in the Middle East.

Despite Clinton's optimistic reading of Assad's declaration that his regime was willing to enter "into normal relations with Israel" — a semantic improvement over Syria's former "total peace for total withdrawal" refrain — there is still much sober and prudent analysis required before Israel can embrace even the possibility of a dialogue with the Syrian dictator.

The major problem with any negotiations to be carried out with Damascus is the credibility factor. For 46 years now all Syrian leaders including the incumbent have promised to wipe Israel off the face of the Middle East map. Their threats, moreover, have not been idle ones: Syrian armies have tried to implement their leaders' genocidal aims against Israel in every major war which has involved Israel and her Arabs neighbors.

Now Assad appears to have learned a more diplomatic turn of phrase. Whether this represents a mellowing of his position or merely the masking of his true beliefs under more decorous prose is a question that Israelis must ask themselves, keeping in mind the famous dictum of former U.S. secretary of State Henry Kissinger — "when people have continually threatened to kill you, it is not altogether surprising that they might also lie to you."

The peace process in the Middle East must inevitably involve Syria but the road to be travelled before that occurs is, judging from Assad's slightly nuanced but still rigid political posture, a very long one.



Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

ONLY THE STUDENTS CAME

My family and I responded to the large advertisement in The CJN of a meeting about Jonathan Pollard. We took the opportunity to attend a fascinating lecture and discussion group on Jonathan Pollard's courageous actions on behalf of Israel.

The meeting, organized by the Network of Canadian Jewish Students and led by Jonathan's sister, Carol Pollard, attracted about 50 people, most of them students. Only about 10 came from the general Jewish community.

It appears that the Toronto Jewish community would rather spend their evenings seeing and discussing Show Boat and Miss Saigon rather than go to a meeting to hear about and help one of the greatest Jewish tragic heroes of our time. What a shame!

THANKS YAD VASHEM

I read the article "Visit to Yad Vashem Gives Educators New Outlook on Teaching the Holocaust" in your paper's Dec. 23 issue.

I think it is important for your readers to know that the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem sponsored both Haia Hasson and myself when we took this course. The contribution and commitment of this organization to the training of teachers in Holocaust education is invaluable. It is important that their work be recognized.

DENVER YOUTH LIKES US

I am an 18-year-old meteorology student at Metro State College of Denver. Last winter it was my privilege to tour the length of Canada by rail, and I was very much impressed by the warmth and friendliness of the Canadian Jewish community. I would therefore enjoy corresponding with any young people of similar age in Canada who would like to exchange ideas and interests.

REPLY TO RABBI ELLIS

I wish to respond to the letter from Rabbi David Ellis of Congregation Tiferes Israel, N.B., which you printed in your Jan. 6 edition.

Dear Rabbi Ellis:

I am writing to you as a Jew, a feminist, and a woman who doesn't just "flow with current social trends." Jewish feminists do not want to abolish latke making, or full-time motherhood, nor do they wish to make all women choose to have careers and abandon their children to others. Feminism these days goes by many different names, such as equality, sharing, liberation, accessibility, and economic reality. Feminism is not about Hellenism. Feminism is about the present, and the future.

I wonder, Rabbi, how many times you have spoken with (not to) young women in your congregation? Have you asked them if they plan to stay home and raise families, while someone else pays the rent? When was the last time you went shopping for groceries to make Sabbath dinner, much less the rest of the week? When was the last time you searched for an affordable apartment, furniture, a car, and all the trimmings for a child? I suspect it was long ago. The fact is, Rabbi, that now it takes two incomes to make a living above the poverty line. Staying home to make wonderful meals and care for our children is a noble goal, but is not always economic reality. How many women are you supporting through single motherhood, divorce, and unemployment? How many thousands of dollars in tuition are you paying for Jewish education for your children?

Feminism is about giving everyone choices. It's wonderful if a woman decides to stay home and take care of her family. It's also wonderful for a woman to fly a plane, run a business, and lead her congregation as rabbi. She'll make another fantastic role model for our children. It's up to you and me, Rabbi, to make the Jewish community viable — not just to another overworked and underpaid woman. Men and women need to learn how to provide equally to family and community life, so that one partner can support the other, instead of separating and segregating ourselves into little corners of appropriate choices.

No longer can we all live as a mythical nuclear unit, with Daddy bringing in the only income. I wonder, Rabbi, if your congregation is like the one where I grew up. The rabbi there wondered where all the young people were going. Why they didn't come in as often, or stay as long. Why they left the city, and didn't return with their children. As long as the only solution to our stressful times is to return to the past, Rabbi, no one will come back. For equality is the future, and it will be glorious and fulfilling.

"UNTHINKABLE"

With the advent of the surprising Israeli-PLO agreement, one may often hear or read, "Only a few months ago it would be unthinkable."

So it would be and, judging by the ensuing events, still is.

TOURETTE'S SYNDROME

Re: Berensteins Retain Hope In Fighting Tourette's (CJN, Jan. 13).

We were thrilled with the article by Leila Speisman. The public awareness value is priceless and very much appreciated. As you know, early diagnosis is quite imprtant, especially to the family dynamics and the affected person's self-esteem.

Thank you for your careful and skillful treatment of a very complicated and often misunderstood disorder.

Torch-lit memories of Germany sixty-one years ago

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

When the new year of 1933 began, I was a young man, preparing to write my law school finals. It had been a turbulent time for me, at the universities of Heidelberg and Berlin. Communists were fighting National Socialists, and both were trying to sink the Social Democrats. Street fights were common, one government was succeeded by another and, though inflation had finally been brought under control, unemployment was high and the fourteen-year-old Weimar Republic was shaky.

We Jews enjoyed the freedom which the Republic gave us, but though the Nazis (as the National Socialists were called) were raucous and abusive, we cherished the pious belief that they would not come to power — certainly not by themselves. For there was no absolute majority for any party in the Reichstag, the imposing structure in the heart of Berlin where the German parliament was sitting.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Then, what we had hoped would never happen did occur: aging President Paul von Hindenburg invited Adolf Hitler to take the reins of government. It was Jan. 30, 1933, sixty-one years ago.

I remember it as clearly as one does remember events that are written with the pen of pain. Nothing much happened during the day, except the radio announcement that Hitler was the German Chancellor. Fear now became palpable.

I went into the streets — contrary to my parents' advice — to see what was going on. In those days I still had a shock of hair blond enough to make me invisible as a Jew. There were lots of people around, and there was a rumour that the Nazis were going to stage a big march.

They did. You could see the torches coming down the street. Borne by brown-clad S.A. men, the quasi-military thugs who had served as Hitler's private army, they came marching in lock-step and singing the Horst Wessel song, "Hold high the banner, close the ranks. . . ."

There were other songs too, including the infamous ditty that had been on the lips of the Nazis ever since they took to the streets: "When Jewish blood will spurt from our knives, things will go twice as well!"

I went home, deeply depressed. But who could know at that moment that within weeks our democracy would freely surrender itself to the monster it had spawned? And how would Ernst Roehm, the leader of the S.S. troopers, know that a year and a half later, he would be killed by his old friend and comrade, Adolf Hitler himself?

And how would anyone in those days have dreamt that in few months we would live under a total and brutal dictatorship, where law was what the Fuehrer decreed?

In retrospect, it is easy to figure out that everyone should have known what was happening. To be sure, a few did. One of my father's closest friends left Germany that night with his family, abandoning all his earthly goods. He went to America, and there I would see him again later on, ensconced in a properous business, representing the Bata company with whom he had had long-time business relations in Europe.

But he was one of the very few. The rest of us thought that the storm would blow over and that the German people would come to their senses. Unfortunately, they did not and yielded to the lure of the charismatic lunatic, who promised them employment and glory.

That was 61 years ago, and now another seducer has arisen who models himself after Hitler, this time in Russia. The world, and, even more important, the Russian people better take a good look at the man to whom so many gave their votes. If they don't, the kind of destruction that Hitler let loose may befall the world once again.

PLO chief can't keep his agreement with Israel

By MOSHE SHARON

Prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, speaking at his annual meeting with news editors, stressed that agreements must be implemented. Yet he also explained that the PLO cannot delete clauses from the Palestinian charter which call for Israel's obliteration as an independent Jewish state. The fact that the PLO has not yet begun to implement even this component of the agreement - which is the only concession on its part - is not accidental, and it has nothing to do with the fact that such changes in the charter need the convening of the Palestine National Council.

The PNC can be convened, but PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat has very little say in it. He cannot deliver the goods. Yet Israel is ready to accept this violation of the agreement, and even find justification for it.

At present, Israel is offering the Palestinians autonomy. This means that the source of authority remains in the hands of Israel, the state bestowing the autonomy. It also means that the autonomous region cannot have any symbols of independence, and that the head of the autonomous administration cannot call himself "state president."

The PLO has a flag and an anthem, and Arafat (alias Abu Ammar) is always called Ra'is Dawlat Filastin, "president of the Palestinian state." All the official papers now used by the PLO carry the emblem of the Palestinian state, and a logo which reads: "The State of Palestine," in Arabic and English. The PLO also intends to issue Palestinian currency and passports.

And the world is ready for all these moves. The international political community and the media have already established the Palestinian state, and Arafat is only waiting for the first opportunity to announce it. He has promised to play the game of "autonomy," but made it clear from the start that he has given up none of the major goals of the organization created almost 30 years ago.

Arafat couldn't keep the agreement with Israel, even if he wanted to. He doesn't control the Palestinian street. The Muslim leadership does - and it has been offering the Palestinians real and meaningful objectives.

It is misleading and dangerous to describe Hamas and the other Muslim groups as "fundamentalist minority" or "extremists" when they represent a majority of the population in both Gaza and the West Bank. They are the real leaders, armed and organized, and they will never accept the existence of a Jewish state on what they regard as holy Islamic land. For them, every Jew is a target.

For Arafat, then, the Islamic movement is an asset, not an impediment. The government has endowed him, free of charge, with the image of peace lover, while terrorist activity against Jews continues.

The PLO will receive everything due to it according to the agreements, Hamas will kill Jews, and Arafat, freed from any responsibility even to denounce the murders, will be able to count on Israel's government and media to stress that the killing is the work of the "enemies of peace."

For Arafat, there is no reason to discard the good services of the Islamic movement. Why should he fight his own brethren in Gaza, who represent the majority of the population, and make life easy for the Israelis, when he can always claim he wasn't allowed to have enough power to control the Palestinian street?

We shall soon hear Arafat saying that if he is to control Gaza he needs tanks and heavy artillery, and probably also a few helicopters and planes. The terror will continue, and there will be those who will find ways to "understand" it: As long as there is one Jew on the other side of the Green Line, they will ascribe terrorist activity to the irritation caused by a Jewish presence.

It is possible, then, to outline the most likely scenario even without details of the government's secret understandings with the PLO.

Clearly, the PLO and the rest of the Arab countries, emphasizing the Israeli withdrawal, not "peace," regard the whole political process as a stage in achieving the goals of the Palestinian Covenant.

In the territories evacuated by Israel, the PLO will create a state with all its symbols and institutions.

Israel has no way of countering such a development, nor any way of monitoring the PLO's military power in Gaza. It will not go to war against the Palestinians if they create an army with triple the agreed number of "police."

The PLO and Hamas will not fight each other. To think that two Palestinian brothers will kill each other to please Jews is utter nonsense. Terror against Jews will continue under the guise of a PLO-Hamas enmity and will be "understood" by some Israeli politicians and accepted as a norm by the world media.

Delegitimization by both the media and government of the Jewish inhabitants in Judea and Samaria will continue. This will make it easy to blame them for the collapse of the "peace."

The "peace process" contains all the elements of failure. Most Arabs aren't yet ready to accept a Jewish state as a legitimate, separate and distinctly European entity in the Middle East. Even the most moderate Arabs speak about the need for Israel to "integrate" into the area — to lose its special Jewish identity and culture and become virtually Arab.

Second, Israelis and Palestinians neither speak the same language nor have the same aims. The Israelis are thinking about real peace; but for the Palestinians, "peace" is merely a tactical move in a much broader national strategy, at the end of which they wish to see the end of Israel.

Were Saddam Hussein asked to describe PLO strategy in this political process, he would term it "the mother of all deceits." (JPFS)

Don't butter/margarine your bread on the wrong side

By JACK CHISVIN

If you are at the bottom of the pile, life must seem like an endless struggle for survival. Those who view the world from a privileged position have totally different concerns. Fortunately, it is the nature of humans that regardless of where they find themselves in the dung heap they have the ability to laugh at their situation. Throughout history, as Jews found themselves more often relegated to the bottom of the dung heap than to the top, they have refined humor to make it a distinctive art. Perhaps that explains why so many stand-up comics are Jewish, and why they stand up.

Humor helps define a society and all ages and cultures have evolved their own indigenous form of humor. Depending on how it is presented, humor can be a medium for flaunting grandiosity and ostentatiousness, revealing arrogance, mocking pretentiousness, and ridiculing human absurdities. It can be graphic or subtle, insulting or gentle, caustic or poignant. As a social commentary, the message humor conveys can often be more lasting than the laugh it delivers.

Visualize the following — a member of the clergy addressing a congregation from the pulpit: "So, in closing, I say to you: don't litter, eat plenty of roughage, squeeze right, and remember your postal code." In an understated way, that single cartoon says more about present North American society and the occupants of the comfortable pew than could be portrayed in an entire essay. But would our perspective change, and would the cartoon be more or less amusing if the preacher was caricatured as a Rabbi instead of a minister or priest, or a woman instead of a man?

Jack Chisvin

In his most recent book, simply titled, Jewish Humor, Rabbi Joseph Telushkin, analyses the Jewish character through a collection of jokes and anecdotes, categorized by issues: family relationships, business, religion, politics, discrimination, and others that fall somewhere in between. He summarizes all the contradictions and anxieties and the paradox of being Jewish in this one joke.

A Jew travels from his small Polish shtetl to Warsaw. When he returns he tells his friends of the wonders he has seen: "I met a Jew who had grown up in a yeshiva and knew large sections of the Talmud by heart. I met a Jew who was an atheist. I met a Jew who owned a large store with many employees, and I met a Jew who was an ardent communist." "So what's so strange?" the friends asks. "Warsaw is a big city. There must be a million Jews there." "You don't understand," the man answers. "It was the same Jew."

Amongst the collection in my library are a number of books on Jewish humor including The Big Book of Jewish Humor compiled by William Novack and Moshe Waldoks. It is an anthology of quotations, jokes and stories which are not specifically ethnic in origin, but as the name implies have a Yiddish tam (Jewish flavor). I am particularly fond of the little vignettes found throughout the book, the likes of which over time, have become associated with Jewish folklore. They are not belly-busters, but little rib ticklers that reflect a gentle wit and kind of logic which borders on the absurd, typically as follows:

A man came to his rabbi with a shila (a question). "Why is it," he asked, "that a buttered slice of bread always falls buttered side down?" "Let's see if that's true," said the Rabbi. The Rabbi buttered a slice of bread and let it fall. This time the buttered side was facing up. "It's obvious," said the Rabbi, "you've been buttering the wrong side."

"Sam, please close the window. It's cold outside." "Nu, and if I close the window, will it be warm outside?"

Levine brings a package to the post office. "It's too heavy," says the clerk. "You'll have to put more stamps on it." "And if I put more stamps on it," replies Levine, "that'll make it lighter?"

Two men went out for a walk, when suddenly it began to rain. "Quick," said one man, "open your umbrella." "It won't help," said his friend, "my umbrella is full of holes." "Then why did you bring it?" asks the first. "Because I didn't think it would rain," the other replies.

Two litigants come before the Rabbi. After hearing the first testimony, the Rabbi says, "It seems that you are right." But after the second man speaks, the Rabbi says, "It seems that you are right." "How can this be?" asks the Rabbi's wife who has been listening to the arguments. "How can both of these men be right?" "Hmm," contemplates the Rabbi, "you're right, too."

"Ladies and Gentlemen," the manager announces, "I am sorry to have to tell you that the great actor Yankel Leib has just had a stroke in his dressing room, a fatal stroke, and we cannot go on with tonight's performance." At this, a woman in the balcony stands up and shouts, "Quick, give him an enema!" "Lady," says the manager, "the stroke was fatal." "So give him an enema," she repeats. Manager: "Lady, you don't get it. Yankel Lieb is dead. An enema can't possibly help." Lady: "So, it wouldn't hurt!"

You laughed — didn't you? — and it didn't hurt. On the contrary, as we Jews have learned, a minute of laughter can soothe an hour of pain. My wish for you in the new year is that every day be a day filled with humor, but be careful not to butter your bread on the wrong side.

Russia's businessmen thrive

Reporting from Moscow and St. Petersburg, Sheldon Kirshner interviews two Jewish businessmen who have prospered on the ruins of communism.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

They are a new breed in Russia's post-Communist society.

They are businessmen, a word and a concept that were scorned during the bygone Soviet era.

Marxist ideology equated business with capitalism and capitalism with exploitation. Private enterprise was forbidden under the law, although it was occasionally tolerated by the authorities.

Since the demise of communism, the collapse of the Soviet Union and the effort by the Russian government to create a free market economy, tens of thousands of businesses have emerged, and with them, a class of freewheeling entrepreneurs.

Evgeny Satanovsky, 34, and Michail Mirilashvili, 33, are among the most prominent.

A former metallurgical engineer, Satanovsky is president of the Moscow-based Ariel Corporation, which buys and sells metals, chemicals, auto parts and consumer goods, manufactures wallpaper and produces processed metal products.

A physician by training, Mirilashvili has real estate holdings, trades in oil and furniture, and owns six of St. Petersburg's estimated 13 casinos. He is one of its wealthiest citizens.

Both are involved in Jewish community affairs. Satanovsky is a vice-president of the Confederation of Jewish Organizations and Communities (Vaad), the umbrella organization of Russian Jewry. Mirilashvili is a patron of the Maccabi sports club.

Satanovsky works out of a suite of plain offices in a typically drab building in central Moscow, built by a tea merchant at the turn of the 19th century.

Mirilashvili's quarters, in an ochre villa once at the disposal of Soviet President Leonid Brezhnev, are in a buccolic, park-like setting near the Neva River. The walled compound is guarded by hard-looking men in camouflage fatigues. Late-model automobiles — a blue Mercedes 600SE and a maroon Lincoln Town Car — are parked in a driveway steps away from the front door.

Established late in 1989, Satanovsky's conglomerate consists of 10 companies and three manufacturing plants. He has 50 employees in Moscow and about 200 in the rest of the old Soviet Union.

Portly, amiable and voluble, with a fairly good grasp of English, Satanovsky is reportedly one of the richest Jewish businessmen in the city. Together with such figures as Yevgeny Kissin, a financier linked with the Russian Exchange Bank; Lev Weinberg, chair of the Russian Manufacturers' Association; and Konstantin Borovoi, founder of the Russian Commodities and Raw Materials Exchange, Satanovsky is a force to be reckoned with in Russia's business circles.

A Jewish activist in the pre-perestroika period, Satanovsky is a third-generation engineer from an assimilated family, who risked his career and his livelihood when dissent was quite a dangerous undertaking.

In 1981, when the study of Hebrew was still prohibited, he enrolled in an underground ulpan. In 1986, he and the current president of the Vaad, Mikhail Chlenov, organized an anti-Pamyat rally. A year later, he was one of the founders of the Jewish Historical Society. In 1988, he and others set up the Jewish Cultural Association.

Satanovsky's entree into the brave, new world of business was through the Jewish Information Service, a Jewish book-publishing venture which he and a few partners launched in 1989 with a loan of about 15,000 roubles (approximately $1,000 US).

Harassed by the KGB's anti-Zionist department, the Jewish Information Service specialized in samizdat, or illegal, crudely-published, clandestinely-circulated books. Satanovsky churned out thousands, but the incipient business was anything but lucrative.

"Jewish books don't bring profit," he said.

A little more than two years ago, intent on making the Jewish Information Service profitable, he reorganized it and began producing vodka and wine bottle labels as well as wallpaper. Eventually, Satanovsky and his associates turned a handsome profit, and then diversified.

Satanovsky claims that he is not a hard currency millionaire and that he and his family live simply in an "ordinary flat." He said he drives a company car and is not averse to using the subway.

Profits are ploughed back into the company, and he pays himself about $1,000 a month, an exceedingly comfortable salary by Russian standards, one that enables him to take vacations abroad, an almost unheard-of luxury in present-day Russia. Still, he plays down his affluence. "Some of my managers earn more than I do."

Satanovsky's success has enabled him to become a philanthropist. He provided start-up funds for the Vaad, and now finances some of its special programs. He is also spearheading a campaign to create a fund-raising agency for the Vaad, a Russian version of the United Jewish Appeal.

Last year, Jews in Russia raised about $1 million (US) for Vaad's 1992 budget, but it was insufficient. "We need more and more and more." Hence the necessity of a structure along the lines of UJA.

As late as three years ago, Satanovsky contemplated aliyah. His friends, and his brother, are already in Israel. But he has no immediate plans to leave.

"Israel is a very nice country, but it has a crazy economy, with too much Soviet-style socialism and Orthodox obscurantism. For us, Israel is the home of the future."

Besides, he added, he wants to build a strong and viable Jewish community in Russia. He is convinced it can be done. "More and more Jews are interested in staying here. Thousands of Jews have returned from the United States and Israel in the past two years. One of my vice-presidents emigrated to Australia. He was back within two months."

Satanovsky claims that, economically speaking, Russia has a colossaly bright future. "It's like the Wild West. I'm very optimistic."

Russia, he declared, can become a prosperous nation in 10 to 12 years. Though he worries about its political stability, he firmly believes that the opportunities in such fast-growing sectors as consumer goods, gas, oil and timber are limitless.

"Russia is already capitalist. Just look at consumer demand. The market is full of TVs, videos, cars. To succeed here, a businessman must provide good quality at a reasonable price."

But, he added, "the market is already flooded with dreck."

Even if a businessman satisfies his customers, he faces a myriad of problems.

"We have an unstable banking system. Major international banks are not represented in Russia. We lack credit facilities. The distribution system is poor."

Satanovsky resents the widely-held Russian perception that the well-off, with their decent standard of living, are by definition engaged in underhanded activities.

"I'm honest and hard-working," Satanovsky countered. "I don't deal with alcohol, tobacco or casinos."

Mirilashvili, a Georgian Jew, appears stylish in a white shirt, black pants and gray sports jacket. By all appearances, he could be a Westerner. He sits behind a huge ebony desk with a cordless telephone. Along one wall is a matching cabinet. Otherwise, the room is bare.

Swarthy and of medium height, Mirilashvili speaks Russian through an interpreter. He enunciates his words slowly, softly and deliberately. He leaves the distinct impression that he is ill at ease giving an interview to a foreign journalist.

Born in the town of Kulashi, he arrived in St. Petersburg 16 years ago. His father was an engineer; his grandfather was the proprietor of a textile factory. He considers himself a religious Jew, and observes kashrut.

Mirilashvili studied medicine and specialized in pediatrics. Four years ago, fed up with his meagre $50-a-month salary, he left his profession for the allure of business. He wanted to provide a better life for himself, his wife and his children.

"It was not difficult," he said, referring to the transition. "Maybe I was lucky."

On the strength of a loan, he embarked on the road to capitalism, and has not looked back. All his interests, including the casinos he and his partners operate, are in Russia. He has several thousand employees, but prefers to call them "colleagues."

He has ties with Israeli and Canadian businessmen. Among his acquaintances is Sid Greenberg of Montreal, the former national president of Maccabi Canada, whom he thanks for hospitality during a recent trip.

Like Satanovsky, Mirilashvili has no interest in emigration, although he feels that aliyah should be the long-range goal of an Orthodox Jew.

His involvement in Jewish community affairs is confined to Maccabi, with which he has been associated since 1990. He and others bought the airplane tickets for 150 athletes who represented Russia at the last Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Mirilashvili is loath to discuss his wealth, possibly because it generates inordinate envy among most Russians.

"To be rich in Russia is not good," he said ruefully. "There is a lot of jealousy."

Israel's relationship with the United States has rarely been better. "It is hard to remember when the White House, Congress and the American media were so friendly to Israel," the Israeli ambassador to Washington, Itamar Rabinovich, has said.

A year after taking office, Bill Clinton is being compared to Ronald Reagan, whom many analysts considered the president most favorably disposed to Israel since Harry Truman.

Clinton has established warm relations with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, and the top officials in his administration charged with planning and implementing Middle East policy are staunchly pro-Israel.

Clinton is credited with ending a tense period in Israel-U.S. relations, characterized by sharp disagreements over Israeli settlements in the territories, American loan guarantees to Israel and a lack of personal empathy between their predecessors, George Bush and Yitzhak Shamir.

By comparison, Clinton and Rabin have forged strong working ties based on mutual trust. In large part, the improvement stems from Rabin's belief in territorial compromise, a position long advocated by Washington.

Clinton's foreign policy team is dedicated to deepening the United States' strategic partnership with Israel in the pursuit of peace and security. Apart from Warren Christopher, the secretary of state, the key decision-makers are: Dennis Ross, the State Department's Mideast co-ordinator; Anthony Lake, the national security advisor; his deputy, Samuel Berger; and Martin Indyk, the president's special assistant for Near East and South Asian affairs, who once served as deputy director of research for the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC).

Since Israel's September 1993 agreement with the PLO, the Clinton administration has made the peace process a high priority, and promised Israel it will be well-compensated for taking risks.

Clinton and Israel

In the face of cutbacks in the foreign assistance program, the president vowed to maintain the current level of U.S. aid to Israel, some $3 billion annually.

There had been suggestions that the United States, given the climate of fiscal restraint in Washington and its new responsibility to Russia, would not be able to meet this commitment. William Harrop, the U.S. ambassador to Israel, had warned of impending reductions, while Senator Daniel Inouye — one of Israel's best friends on Capitol Hill — had declared, "It would be foolish to think it could go on forever."

The White House, however, insisted that aid programs to Russia would not affect Israel, the largest single recipient of U.S. assistance.

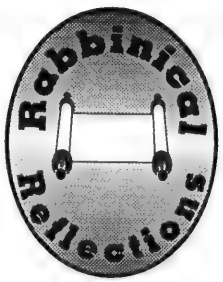
Clinton made that clear by recalling Harrop and temporarily replacing him with William Brown, the previous ambassador. Last September, the 1994 foreign aid appropriations bill, totalling $12.5 billion, cleared the Senate. Israel's share is $1.2 billion in economic aid and $1.8 billion in military assistance. (Egypt, the United States' primary ally in the Arab world, will get $2.1 billion. Russia will receive $2.5 billion.)

By all accounts, Washington's overall aid to Jerusalem will increase if Israel's accord with the PLO is implemented, and if the Israeli government signs peace agreements with its Arab neighbors. (It will be recalled that Israel received a huge infusion of U.S. funds, over and above its regular aid, after its 1979 treaty with Egypt.)

In addition to outright aid, the Clinton administration has reaffirmed the United States' interest in maintaining Israel's "qualitative military edge" over the Arabs.

At his last meeting with Rabin in the White House, Clinton gave Israel permission to purchase the newest American computers and electronic monitoring equipment, as well as the latest U.S. fighter plane, the F-15E. Furthermore, the United States is continuing to fund the Arrow missile program, touted as an essential component of Israel's future defence system.

Of course, Israel and the United States don't see eye-to-eye on each and every matter. Clinton, for example, criticized Israel's deportation of 400 Muslim fundamentalists in December 1992. But this incident had no detrimental impact on Israel's links with the United States.



By RABBI AARON LEVINE

This week I celebrate with the Almighty's blessings a very special personal event — the aufruf (being called to the Torah the Shabbat before one's wedding) of my first-born son; next week, G-d willing, will be the first wedding of one of my children. I was asked to write about Tu b'Shevat which we celebrate this Thursday. With your indulgence I would like to combine the two.

Parenthetically, I was intrigued by the difference with which a Jewish groom prepares for his wedding and l'havdil how others prepare. My impression is that others celebrate with a stag party, get drunk, have a last fling, etc. The Jewish groom prepares by being called to the Torah, by hearing words of Torah from a rabbi on that Shabbat, by fasting on the day of the wedding, and by the kiddushin ceremony, the ceremony of sanctity under the chuppah, followed by a week of sheva brochos. What a contrast!

In speaking of Tu b'Shevat, the holiday of trees, I was struck by two things. One, the comparison of a tree to a person, as the verse in the Torah says, "for man is likened to the tree of the field," (Devarim 20;19). Two, I reminded myself of one of the most beautiful Talmudic passages in reference to a tree. (See Tractate Taanis, 5b-6a).

The Talmud tells us that when Rabbi Nachman was about to depart from Rabbi Isaac, Rabbi Nachman asked for his blessing. Rabbi Isaac replied by telling him that his request might be compared to the following.

A man was journeying in the desert; he was hungry, weary and thirsty. He came across a tree, the fruits of which were sweet, its shade pleasant, and a stream of water was flowing beneath it. He ate of its fruits, drank of the water, and rested under its shade. When he was about to continue his journey, he said: "Ilan, ilan (tree, O tree), with what shall I bless you? Shall I pray that your fruits be sweet? They are already sweet! Shall I pray that your shade be pleasant? It is already pleasant! Shall I pray that a stream of water flow beneath you? There is already a stream that flows beneath you! Therefore I pray that it be God's will that all of the shoots taken from you be like you."

So also with you [continued rabbi Isaac]. With what shall I bless you? With knowledge of Torah? You already possess knowledge of Torah. With riches? You have riches already. With children? You have children already. So I pray that it be God's will that all your offspring be as [beautiful as] you."

When a young man is about to be married, he is hopefully going to produce, with the Almighty's help, many sweet fruits that will branch out into many generations. I pray that my son, as with all Jewish brides and grooms, will be blessed with furtherance of Torah knowledge, with riches, and with children. I pray that he will be as a tree with a solid trunk, deeply rooted in his Jewish faith and heritage that will withstand the winds and storms that often seek in life to uproot it. Above all I pray that he and his dear kallah (bride) will develop into two beautiful human beings, strong in their observances between Man and God; strong in their relationships between themselves and their fellow men. Their ultimate blessing and ours, will be that people shall bless them by praying that their offspring will be as beautiful as they are.

May we all merit being able to recite soon, especially the sixth brachah of the sheva brochos, the blessing: "Blessed are You Hashem, our God, King of the universe, Who created joy and gladness, groom and bride; mirth, glad song, pleasure, delight, love, brotherhood, peace, and companionship. HaShem, our God, let there soon be heard in the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem, the sound of joy and the sound of gladness, the voice of the groom and the voice of the bride; the sound of the grooms' jubilance from their canopies and of youths from their song-filled feasts. Blessed are You, Who gladdens the groom with the bride." Auf simchas. Amein!

Tu b'Shevat a celebration of trees

By RABBI BERNARD RASKAS
Special to The CJN

ST. PAUL (JTA) — Tu b'Shevat, the 15th day of the Hebrew month of Shevat, is the Jewish Arbor Day, a holiday known in the Talmud as the New Year's Day of the Trees.

A verse in Deuteronomy (20:19) says, "You must not cut them [trees] down. You may eat of them, but you must not destroy them."

Judaism endows trees, indeed all growing things, with reverence. Trees have a special sense of sacredness and must be treated with a special respect and protectiveness, as they are essential to life itself.

A single tree can carry the workload of five average room air conditioners running 20 hours a day. Trees can add from $3,000 to $7,000 to property values. An acre of young trees provides enough oxygen to keep 18 people alive. Trees provide sound barriers that reduce noise pollution.

Leaves are the food factories of the world: we could not exist without them. Through the process of photosynthesis, leaves take carbon dioxide from the atmosphere, the sun's energy from the universe and water from the soil to produce the essential ingredients of food.

Just think how the world's trees quietly contribute to the shaping of our environment.

A wise man wished to discourage his four sons from making rash judgments. In winter, he sent the eldest to see a mango tree. In the spring, he sent the next oldest son on the same errand. In summer, the third son made the journey. And in autumn, the youngest boy followed the path his brothers had taken. Then the wise man called them together.

"Describe the tree," he said.

The first said that the tree looked like a burnt and barren stump. The second disagreed, describing abundant green foliage. The third spoke of colorful blossoms. The fourth said that all three of the brothers were wrong. "Its fruit was like a pear."

"Each of you is right," said the father, "for each of you saw the same thing in a different season."

So it must be when we view the conduct of other people. We should refrain from passing judgment until we are certain that we have seen "the tree in all its seasons."

In the order of creation, trees were created on the third day. Then metal came into being. When the trees realized that metal could be used to fashion implements of destruction, they became alarmed over the threat to their future.

So the trees protested to God, saying, "Why did you create an ax which will destroy us?" God replied, "In order for an axe to function, it must have a handle of wood. If you do not permit yourselves to be used improperly, you will not be destroyed."

This comment has profound and far-reaching implications. Trees, like all forms of creation including human beings have the potential for good and for evil. It is their use that determines their outcome.

Miller trains lens on community

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Morris Miller, a Thornhill 58-year-old public accountant, the most enduring sights are those of a sallow-faced boy in cheder, an 80-year-old woman laughing heartily at a Yiddish concert, or a jut-jawed Jewish war veteran marching in a Remembrance Day parade.

That's why Miller, whose hobby is photography, has trained one of his dozens of cameras and lenses on the people he believes represent the vibrant Jewish community of which he is a part.

For the past two years, since he revived his interest in a boyhood activity, he's been popping up and down at concerts, parades, meetings, walkathons, in fact wherever the action is, and in particular where there is an activity connected to Jewish culture of today.

And he's been refused admittance to some synagogues and some Jewish buildings because officials feared that he wanted to peddle his pictures, despite his protests that all he wanted to do is record Jewish life.

"There is a tendency in the Jewish community to value only things that are a hundred years old," Miller said.

"We need a separate gallery or sections of our museums devoted to current Jewish life. Our young people shouldn't just see the dark past but things which show the rejuvenation of our Jewish culture."

Part of his wish was fulfilled recently when the Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., (789-5502) mounted an exhibit of 41 of his photos of the Jewish music scene in Toronto, running to Jan. 30. They show singers, musicians, and performers at rest, in full flight, or meditating behind the scenes. There is a chance you were in the audience when he took the picture.

Miller never takes posed shots, never lines people up in a row, and he never tries to control the event he's covering. At many concerts and meetings he's had to battle the worst possible lighting conditions. "I just wait until the right moment comes along; you can't get a good picture if you're stingy with film."

In operating his own darkroom, Miller gets help from his wife, Etti, and their youngest daughter, Tamara. Another daughter, Naomi, is married.

Faced with a growing cataract in one eye, the photographer had to concentrate on the viewfinder with his left eye, but following successful surgery to remove the cataract, he can now handle the camera with either eye.

United Way funding for Jewish groups stays flat

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There's good and bad news — and a question mark — this year for the nine Jewish agencies in Metro which received funding from the United Way.

The good news is that five of those agencies' United Way allocations will go unchanged from last year.

The bad news isn't so bad, given that at three agencies, the drop in funding is not that dramatic. The only sharp decrease in transfer payments will be to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, which will get 33 per cent less than last year.

And the question mark is at the Jewish Community Centre (JCC). Last year, it received just over $462,000 from the United Way. This year, the amount of the allocation is pending, since the cash-strapped JCC has not been able to provide the United Way with necessary financial projections.

Last year's sum has been "earmarked" for the JCC but is being delayed until the centre can provide the United Way with an idea of where its finances are heading, United Way spokeswoman Susan Pigott told The CJN.

Pigott said the JCC should know about its grant by the end of February.

At a news conference last week, United Way president Anne Golden called the 1993 campaign "the most difficult in our history, but very successful."

The United Way will distribute $38.1 million this year to some 250 community groups and health and social service agencies.

About $31 million will go to United Way member charities; a further $2.5 million to charities in Ajax, Pickering, Oakville and Peel and York regions; $850,000 in short term grants to non-member charities and $3.8 million to agencies designated by donors.

This year's allocations are based on a record $46.5 million raised during the 1993 drive, $1 million more than in 1992.

Because of the sour economy, only 19 of the United Way's 133 member agencies will see an increase this year, Golden said.

The United Way allocates over $3 million to Jewish agencies in Metro, or about eight per cent of its total grants.

Several Jewish agencies receive more funds from United Jewish Appeal than from United Way. Some get less from UJA. Baycrest receives no UJA dollars.

Three agencies, Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) and Baycrest, receive the lion's share of their budgets from the provincial government.

Before the recession hit, Jewish agencies received yearly increases from the United Way of between five and 10 per cent.

- The third largest recipient of United Way funds, JF&CS, will receive just over $1.34 million this year, the same amount as last year.
- Jewish Vocational Services will get $397,916, the same as a year ago.
- The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care will receive $380,079, down $10,000 from a year ago and a decrease for the second straight year. But Baycrest should net the same sum as last year because of donations targeted specifically to it.
- The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living's grant will remain the same as last year, just over $143,000.
- Senior Care's allocation for this year, $108,981, is unchanged from 1993.
- The most dramatic drop in United Way funding will be at Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, whose social planning committee will receive $45,701 this year, down from the $68,000 it got in 1993 and half of what it received two years ago.
- Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa will receive $44,170, the same amount as last year.
- The Jewish Camp Council's 1994 allocation will be $18,168, a slight drop from last year.

A year ago, Jack Chisvin, then president of Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, said the federation had agreed to a reduced allocation as a trade-off to limit cuts at other Jewish agencies.

Current president Bernard Ghert said the federation "is doing as much as it can to absorb the cuts, to avoid affecting the agencies." He stressed the importance of the UJA campaign and the need for support from the Jewish community.

'Fake' Ethiopian Jew in community

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A man claiming to be an Ethiopian Jew with a sick wife and twin daughters told such a convincing story that one Toronto couple gave him about $700 in cash.

He gave a false address and the couple has alerted police and given them a description.

"He seems to be moving downtown; the first call we had a couple of months ago was from Beth Tzedec Congregation," said Constable Allan Bowman of the Metro Police multicultural unit.

A lawyer, a psychologist, and a religious leader are among those who have fallen for his ploy.

The man is so brazen he went to the offices of the Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) to ask for money, but failed to come back with his wife as he promised.

Apparently he is not the only person posing as an Ethiopian Jew needing help, because the problem has escalated to the point where a cautionary joint letter has just gone out to major synagogues from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (JFGT) and to JF&CS.

The letter says non-Jews, posing as Jews, are soliciting money from individuals or remuneration for speaking about Ethiopian Jewry. It recommends that those asked for such help check with Sharon Gladstone of JF&CS (638-7800) or Avrum Rosensweig of JFGT (631-5733).

"This one man, who always wears a yarmulke, shows up at the oddest hours asking for help," said Simon Kalkstein of JF&CS.

Michael Levine, a downtown resident who gave him money several times, said he always needed money because his landlord had locked him out for nonpayment of rent, or he needed money for a taxi to collect money orders waiting for him.

"He seemed to go from one mezuzah to another," said Levine, who said the man told convincing stories about the exodus.

The letter to the synagogues was signed by Alan Reitzes, executive director, JFGT, and Gordon Wolfe, executive director, JFCS.

Chezi Zionce, leader of the Narayever Congregation downtown, said the man posing as an Ethiopian was so convincing he gave him a few dollars, invited him to come to services, and even suggested the congregation might consider adopting him as they had in the case of other needy Jews. He never came back.

"He dropped a lot of names of prominent Jews uptown, even somebody connected with the Federation, and I got the impression he was picking up a few dollars here, and a few dollars there, and was moving downtown," said Zionce. "He's always after quick cash."

The couple which lost the most money invited him in for several meals. He told them his wife was an Italian and their twins required expensive medication. He said he had worked for a Bathurst Street restaurant and that restaurant did in fact confirm they had an employee by that name but he had left their employ.

When the couple went to an address on Brooke Avenue in North York which the man had given them, they found it was false. One other time they dropped him off at a house in Parkdale, and when they went in the house to check, it turned out he must have gone into the backyard and disappeared.

Monte Carlo dinner set for Beth Emeth

TORONTO — The annual Monte Carlo Dinner Draw will be held at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue Feb. 22.

Each year between 400 and 500 people attend.

For the past 20 years, David Anisman and his team have worked diligently on the sale of tickets and preparation of the event. In addition to the purchase of a Million Dollar Israel Note, the proceeds are donated to a worthy cause. This year, the recipient is the Jerusalem College of Technology, a fully-accredited engineering school founded in 1969.

Monies raised through the sale of tickets will help build a new dormitory for immigrant students and scientists on campus.

Anisman will again be donating the grand prize of $5,000. Many other prizes will be awarded to lucky holders during the evening. Tickets are $150 and will be entered in the draw. Tax receipts will be issued (less the cost of the dinner).

To order your tickets, please contact the office of Canadian Friends of the Jerusalem College of Technology, 787-7565.

ISRAEL DAY AT U OF T

"There is more to Israel than politics," said organizers of the University of Toronto's recent Israel Day. Organizers Robyn Farber and Dan Freeman of the university's Jewish Student Union, along with over 100 volunteers, transformed the lobby of the Sidney Smith building on St. George Street with 17 booths devoted to subjects ranging from Medicine and Psychology in Israel to kibbutz and army life. A student-painted mural, at top right of photo, was a colorful finishing touch. Israeli folk singer Daphna Tsur and folk dancer Marco Ben-Shimon also took part in the event, and students sampled kosher falafels and bourekas from Cafe a Deux. A contest sponsored by Shalom-K Travel Ltd. offered roundtrip airfare to Israel, prompting student Maridel Chou to say, "I sure hope I win because now there's so much I want to see in Israel." In contrast to previous years, organizers said the day was not marred by confrontation.

Special police unit on guard against hate crimes, propaganda

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last week, Ontario's Ministry of the Solicitor General and Correctional Services (MSGCS) announced a set of guidelines geared to helping provincial police departments respond better to hate-motivated crimes.

For officers of the Metro Toronto police's hate crimes unit, the guidelines may have been a little old hat. The unit, established as a sub-division within the police intelligence section, has been addressing the question of hate crimes and hate propaganda since its inception a year ago.

"Our unit's most important function is to comply with procedures in responding to hate crimes. . . to analyze the crimes, compile statistics and support the police units responding to incidents," said Det. Sgt. Wayne Cotgreave, the officer who heads the unit.

Cotgreave said that in addition to those duties, about one-third of the time spent by the unit's officers is devoted to educational activities — trying to nip the problem in the bud among young people.

Extremist groups like the Heritage Front and the Church of the Creator have been found recruiting in Metro-area schools, often leaving leaflets and other propaganda at the schools.

Sgt. Dino Doria, who heads up the unit's education program, described its approach as "a proactive initiative with all the school boards."

One result of that work will be on display on Feb. 24, when the city of North York will introduce a group of student actors who will perform a series of vignettes on hatred and prejudice.

Doria said that the performance group was inspired by a similar troupe from New Jersey, which visited Toronto last year. (See related story.)

The unit is also co-operating with the Scarborough Board of Education and the Metro Toronto French School Board to develop a bilingual video aimed at students in Grade 6 and up, that will "focus on resisting peer pressure to join some of these [hate] groups," Doria said.

Cotgreave said the unit is developing an anti-racist computer game that may one day be introduced in schools.

Police officers meet with principals and other school administrators, with security officials like campus police, and even with public works employees to educate them to recognize racist and report propaganda, grafitti and symbols, Doria said.

Similarly, the unit is educating officers on the beat. Holding up a stack of reports, Doria said that individual officers are now able to recognize the racist element in certain incidents, like assault or mischief, and to report them.

Sgt. Dino Doria

While Jewish community professionals involved in anti-racist work applauded the creation of the unit and much of its work, some have criticized police for not establishing a "dedicated" unit whose sole mandate would be to address hate crimes.

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, has also questioned whether focusing on public education is the best use of the unit's resources.

"We need police to police," he said. "While I think it's good they do the extracurricular work, their first and foremost task is to police hate."

Pointing to the MSGCS recommendations, he said the Ministry also calls for "consideration [to] be given to establishing a dedicated unit to investigate" these sorts of crimes in communities over 100,000.

Farber, who stresses that "we are not police bashers," said he has repeatedly called for the laying of hate promotion charges in cases involving hatemongers. He criticized the unit for failing to investigate whether a skinhead band at a rock concert last summer promoted hatred of identifiable groups through their provocative lyrics. Farber points out that later that night, a Tamil dishwasher was assaulted by someone who attended that concert.

"I see a lack of fire in the belly" in both the police and the attorney-general's office, he said. Pointing to an incident last year, in which Deputy Chief David Boothby at first said police had recommended hate-promotion charges in four cases and then retracted his statement, Farber said such incidents lead to "frustration" among Jewish professionals.

Responding to some of the critiques, Doria said the approach taken in Toronto is working. The average police officer on the beat is aware of the new guidelines, and in a city the size of Toronto, the effectiveness of the anti-racist effort is enhanced by making each officer a part of the anti-racist effort, he said.

Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, said the hate crimes unit has gotten off to a good start but that its work must be strengthened with more resources and staff. "The people I've had contact with [in the unit] are very committed to this [cause]," she said, adding she would like to see the unit become "dedicated" solely to focusing on hate crimes. She also called for expansion of hate crime units to the national scene — a "joint forces operation" — that would include the RCMP, CSIS and federal and provincial law enforcement ministries.

New Jersey officer lauds Toronto

TORONTO — Paul Goldenberg has seen it all. A career cop with 13 years experience, he's travelled to several jurisdictions in the United States and even visited Israel to help local police get a handle on the growing incidence of hate crimes.

On the home front, he's co-chaired a national curriculum for the U.S. Department of Justice on hate crimes to help educate law enforcement agencies about the problem. And he's been to Toronto six times in the last year or so to help get Metro's hate crime unit up and running.

Goldenberg, who heads New Jersey's office of bias crime and community relations, likes what he sees in Toronto. "The Metro Toronto police are by far one of the finest police departments in the world," he says. "It's an agency [dedicated] to furthering human relations in Toronto. They care."

Goldenberg said because of similarities in their jurisdictions, law enforcement officials in Toronto and the Garden State can learn a lot from each other. Both areas are home to a vast diversity of multicultural groups, and both have seen a disturbing rise in hate crimes, known more commonly in the United States as "bias crimes."

While hatred and bigotry "won't be prosecuted out of existence," Goldenberg believes police have a role to play in "educating them out of existence." In that respect, he continues, the Toronto police are at the cutting edge of new programs and approaches.

Some of what the Toronto police are introducing can be traced back to developments in New Jersey, while other programs are Canadian originals, he said.

One New Jersey program that has proven successful is P.I.E., the Positive Impact Ensemble, a grass roots theatre group developed by black and Hispanic high school students. It "teaches kids that hate and bigotry are not okay."

Toronto Deputy Police Chief David Boothby invited the entire ensemble cast to Toronto last September. The performance inspired a similar program in Toronto.

Another innovative program pioneered in New Jersey is a commission that includes community groups, the clergy, representatives from the corporate sector and human rights advocates who meet to iron out differences that might arise between communities in conflict, he said.

The program has turned into a resounding success, Goldenberg stated. When the rest of the country was reeling from disturbances in the wake of police acquittals in the Rodney King beating case, New Jersey remained calm.

The state has also seen the appointment of a "bias officer" within each police force at the county level whose office is in the community he or she serves and who acts as a liaison with that community.

Hate crimes must not only be fully investigated, but the victims must be treated with sensitivity and visited in follow-up meetings to show their concerns are being addressed by law enforcement officials, Goldenberg said.

"Most bias crimes are not committed by guys in white sheets, but by everybody's child," he continued.

"There is no doubt in my mind that hatred and bigotry are learned behaviors, and can be unlearned."

Jews have become a primary target of hatemongers in New Jersey, he continued. Many of the incidents involve desecration of synagogues and of targetting rabbis' homes with anti-Semitic grafitti, and there have even been some physical assaults.

"I attribute it to [the proposition] that in the 1990s, hatred and bigotry have literally become chic. They've become mainstream and accepted," Goldenberg said.

Education at the grass roots level, as well as recognizing and identifying bias crimes, are the keys to tackling them, he said. — P.L.

THANK YOU, TORONTO

When the men, women and children of Yesha (Judea, Samaria & Gaza) turned to this city for help to meet their humanitarian needs, you were there.

You were there when they reached out for moral and financial backing.

You were listening when they spoke of personal sacrifice for the security of Israel. You rallied behind them in large numbers.

"Who would have thought that Jews in the front line would have to buy ambulances for themselves ... How has it happened that they cannot get a mortgage like in any other place?"

Poverty hits Jewish kids, elderly, students told

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over 13 per cent of Toronto Jewish children under the age of 14 live in poverty, said Gordon Wolfe, executive director, Jewish Family & Child Service, at a recent York University program.

Poverty in the Jewish community is lower than in the general community, Wolfe noted. In the larger community, 19.8 per cent of children under 14 live in poverty, compared to 13.4 per cent of Jewish children. The percentage rises dramatically for children of single parent homes. Within the Jewish community, 30 per cent of children living in single parent homes live in poverty.

Wolfe, who spoke at a bagel brunch co-sponsored by the Jewish Student Federation (JSF) and UJA on Campus about Jewish Poor in Toronto: Myth or Fact?, stressed that poverty doesn't mean "I don't have as much money this year as I had last year.

"I'm talking about subsistance level. Twelve thousand dollars a year [for an elderly person] is not a lot of money, especially if you have to pay rent. It's barely survival."

Wolfe noted that although the elderly only represent about 17 per cent of Toronto's Jewish population, those over 65 represented one third of the Jewish poor in 1991 census data.

In 1989 the House of Commons passed a resolution to eliminate poverty among Canadian children by the year 2000, Wolfe noted. "Not only are they not beginning to achieve that goal, but the situation has gotten worse. There is more poverty now than when they passed that resolution."

Poverty hits kids hardest, said Wolfe, noting the adverse effects on children's health and education. "Children [who live in poverty] will not do as well in school. It perpetuates the whole problem."

Gordon Wolfe

The JF & CS caseload, which represents 1,000 people at any one time, reflects a "significant" amount of poverty in the Jewish community, Wolfe said. One quarter of the agency's caseload consists of people on financial assistance.

The agency's financial assistance program provides long-term supplementary income for low wage earners and people with disabilities or chronic illness. Short-term assistance is available in cases such as illness, job loss or resettlement.

In 1993, the United Jewish Appeal gave $1.2 million to the Jewish poor through JF & CS. "This has always been a priority in UJA, second only to money that goes to Israel," Wolfe noted. "The levels which people get on welfare are intolerable. This program is sacred. It's the only one that doesn't have a budget. There are guidelines as to how much we can give, but we don't run out of money because of a budget. Last year we went over by $150,000 because of need.

"We respect your dignity," Wolfe said. "We don't think you should go to food banks." Wolfe noted that extra money is made available at Passover, and the community distributes Passover food baskets through National Council of Jewish Women (NCJW). NCJW obtains their list of recipients (with the recipients' approval) from JF & CS.

JF & CS also runs a second-hand clothing store on Bathurst Street called Just a Second where financial assistance clients can shop at no cost.

"We want people to be able to live Jewishly. We want them to be able to live — if they want to — within the Jewish community. It's more expensive to live on the Bathurst strip (between Lawrence Avenue and Steeles Avenue) than in Scarborough or Etobicoke," Wolfe said.

"The worst thing is to be Jewish and poor," Wolfe recalls a client saying. "You don't want to go to the government because you're ashamed, and you don't want to go to the Jewish community because you're poor."

London's Jewish community fighting recession's bite

By MARA KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — Like other Jewish communities in Canada, London has endured the hardships of the recession, which have resulted in disappearing donations. With the combination of the recession and large losses in leadership gifts, London's fund-raising allocation is currently at approximately 1987 rates.

Reduction in local funding has meant a scaled back preschool program and Jewish education budget. Both the community day school and synagogue supplemental schools have been affected.

"In 1991, three per cent or 18 people covered 53 per cent of our campaign," said Gerry Enchin, executive director of the London Jewish Federation. "Currently, only nine of those original 18 donors give to UJA in London."

Also, the Federation requested "support and patience from the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) of Canada until we weathered this financial storm," said Enchin. London, like other federated communities, allocates a percentage of locally-raised funds for national Canadian organizations. "We started minimal payments to CJF Canada last year," he added.

Recently, some people have started honoring their past pledges. Enchin predicts the 1993-94 UJA campaign that officially closes June 30, will be flat to last year's, $415,000. Like other communities, Federation auditors have increased allowance for unpaid pledges from three to six and half per cent.

Enchin doubts that the campaign will recover to its peak of $528,000 in 1992 but he hopes with Federation leadership to increase the donor base.

New Jews in town

London, unlike other communities, does not have a large endowment fund. There are two gifts whose interest supplements the University of Western Ontario's Jewish Student Union. Also there are specific funds designated towards leadership development, social services, teacher training and a joint rabbis' fund. Enchin would like to see more endowment development. "We need to reach a point where we are not living from campaign to campaign," he said.

"There are new Jews in town, and they are staying," said Enchin. This is evident in the growth of the Reform synagogue, Temple Israel. The temple has recently bought land and is planning a new building. Currently, the religious school and some activities are held in a house on the site. Shabbat and other holiday services are held at the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) located several kilometres away.

The UJA Fall phone-a-thon added 18 new names to the growing donor list of 600.

Accurate population numbers are difficult to obtain. The recent Statistics Canada census has revealed an increase in London's Jews from 1981 to 1991: 2,300—2,670. But Enchin is skeptical of the new numbers.

He said the census changed how it asks a person's religion. "It used to be ethnicity/religion. Now, there are several options and the ability to check off twice," explained Enchin.

Despite numbers, Enchin says that London has a unique Jewish population. Although London lacks a kosher butcher or bakery, it does boast a community day school and three synagogues/temples, and chapters of Hadassah-WIZO, National Council of Jewish Women and B'nai Brith, Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, Canada-Israel Foundation for Academic Exchanges, Friends of Lubavitch, Jewish National Fund, and State of Israel Bonds.

New WJCC president aims at improving communal relations

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Donald Aronovitch, the new president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC), has set one of his goals as improving the working relationship between the different constituencies and organizations in the community.

"We are too small a community both in terms of numbers and dollars to be working at cross purposes," says Aronovitch who assumed the position in place of the retiring Mel Fages at a December meeting. "We are all working hard to make our own programs successful — as it should be — but we should also sit down together, examine what we are doing and see how we could do things more effectively. There is a lot of room for us to harmonize energies and create synergy from our combined efforts."

The scion of a well known Winnipeg family, Aronovitch, a financial planner, has been an active member of the WJCC for many years. He is also a current board member of the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and the Jewish Community Campus of Winnipeg Inc. He describes his ascension to the presidency as a natural evolution, something he was "desirous of doing" and a responsibility which fits both his and the community council's agenda at this time.

A second goal of his presidency is to work with the constituent organizations to develop a "game plan" to encourage younger people to participate in leadership roles in all areas of the community. "We need an intake mechanism that would welcome younger people into organizations on an ongoing basis," he says. "It doesn't matter how they become involved or with which organization. If they are good workers, the community as a whole will be enriched."

At the same time, he cautions that those who have put in their time already should not be ignored. "I am personally planning on consulting several of my predecessors for their thoughts, insights and guidance," he says.

"It is important," he notes, "that community fundraising become a year round effort. Our givers should be kept informed of what we are doing and where their dollars are being spent on an ongoing basis. In any business, communicating with the public is a challenge. We have to communicate collectively and we need input from our donors."

Hamilton Jewish federation gearing up for a busy year

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Establishment of a long-term planning committee and the development of an endowment fund, a "more orderly approach" to the numerous fundraising appeals launched each year as well as greater cohesion among agencies and organizations are among the Hamilton-Wentworth and Area Jewish Federation's goals for the coming year.

With these and other plans announced at Federation's recent annual general meeting at the Jewish Community Centre, "we will have a busy year ahead of us," said incoming president David Steinberg.

The former chair of Ontario region United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada, and of the Hamilton United Jewish Welfare Fund (UJWF), said "local policies will not overshadow our commitments to Israel."

Steinberg, who is also a past president of Beth Jacob congregation, succeeds Abe Szpirglas, whom he praised for having led the community through a difficult period "with a steely optimism and a sound pragmatism that has made our community work."

Steinberg noted that Federation was able to keep all its commitments and he paid tribute to UJWF chair CeCe Schreiber whose efforts, he said, "produced a campaign that rescued us from almost certain disaster."

Reviewing his two-year term as resident, Szpirglas said with "four shuls, three schools, the JCC, Jewish Social Services (JSS), Shalom Village Beth Tikvah (a residence for developmentally handicapped adults), 37 organizations and the recently established Yeshiva," this community has "the infrastructure and the committed people to provide Hamilton-Wentworth Jewry with a rich and varied Jewish life."

But, he went on, this is possible only "if people give responsibly and generously both financially and of their time in volunteer service."

Szpirglas announced the long-term planning committee will be chaired by Ina Frank. The endowment fund will be headed by Schreiber and treasurer Bill Halpren.

There was applause for Schreiber when she reported a 14.4 per cent card-per-card increase in this year's campaign and that "the best Super Sunday ever" achieved a 10.8 per cent increase.

As well, said Schreiber in making a presentation to women's division chair Sandra Fuss, this year's women's division total was also the highest ever.

Other campaign leadership awards went to Jay State and to Larry Szpirglas.

Reporting on his committee's activities, community relations chair Dr. Lawrence Hart said co-ordinated sponsorship of programs with other organizations resulted in greater attendance.

JSS director Carol Krames illustrated her report with a slide show of various seniors' activities and outings, while Patricia Tolkin Eppel gave a brief personal account of her first six months as Federation executive director.

Etrogim become Tu b'Shevat jam

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —When people think of Tu b'Shevat, they almost always think of the little packages of dried fruits and bokser that they got (and youngsters still get) at Jewish school.

This year, and for the past three years before, there is another option — etrog jam.

The members of N'shei Bobov, the women's auxiliary of the Bobov organization, sell etrog jam to raise funds for their projects, especially one where they lend baby furniture and supplies, such as cribs or car seats, for short terms.

Spokeswoman Zeldy Miller told The CJN that the women "pass the word" around at Sukkot for families to save their etrogim, the citron which, because it is both beautiful to look at and fragrant, is used on that holiday to symbolize both the ideal Jew, and the heart.

As well, she said, dealers donate their leftover etrogim for the project.

Preparing the jam is a project in itself. A large group of women get together once a year, make the preserve and ladle it into attractive jars.

Because the etrog is naturally bitter, the fruit is cooked in successive changes of water seven or eight times, and finally cooked together with sugar and quince apples.

"The jam is sweet, with a tinge of bitterness," Miller said, adding that her family eats etrog jam all year round.

Re-using the Sukkot etrog on Tu b'Shevat helps to emphasize the continuous chain of Torah and mitzvot that links one holy day to another, and the holiness inherent in the daily cycle of the Jewish life.

The etrog jam will be available in Jewish stores in the Bathurst corridor, or from Miller, at 256-0052.

An oil painting by Alexander Doyle.

Young Soviet artist wins first prize in Burlington show

By MOURA WOLPERT

HAMILTON — Winning first prize in the Burlington Fine Art Association's recent annual juried show at the Burlington Cultural Arts Centre was an important first step to recognition for a young Soviet immigrant.

Alexander Doyle, who changed his name from Dzoebko to make pronounciation easier, has been in Canada barely two years, but already the 29-year-old artist is attracting attention.

His work can currently be seen in a show entitled From Russia With Art he shares with fellow immigrant Sergey Malina at the Westdale Gallery in Hamilton.

The painting that won him the prize, an oil in the realist style entitled The Ride and depicting the interior of a bus with a rain-splashed funeral procession seen through its windows, is not among them. The Ride, Doyle explains "is about life and death, about time and who we are and why we are here."

The works here are mostly oils, serene and lovely landscapes painted in Holland, where he spent two years before coming to Canada; glistening fresh snowscapes from Thunder Bay, his first stop in this country, and a series of surrealist compositions, some romantic, some almost gothic, others bordering on the macabre.

Vaguely reminiscent of Salvador Dali, whose work greatly impressed Doyle when he first saw it in the West, these latter paintings are heavily symbolic with many unexpected and thought-provoking touches.

"Metaphysical topics have always been interesting for me... I always try to show good and bad," explains Doyle.

A startling contrast to the oils is a large black-and-white study in pencil of a nude ascending a long stone stairway, and on a very much smaller scale, a tiny pen and ink drawing done in Russia in which, he says, he tried to express his "longing for freedom."

All his work is executed with the meticulous craftsmanship and attention to detail of his traditionalist training in the art schools of the former Soviet Union, first in Krasnodar and then, following his two-year army service, in Leningrad (now St. Petersburg).

Impressed with the modern art he saw in Holland and Canada, Doyle says he is now ready to experiment with new ideas and new concepts.

But, "I never wanted to imitate anyone," he states. "No one has ever influenced me."

Originally from Rostov-on-Don, Doyle now lives in Hamilton with his wife, Tanya, whom he met at the Leningrad Institute of Art and who will be taking up her studies again at McMaster University in the fall. Doyle, too, intends to return to university and eventually, he hopes to teach.

For his second show at the Westdale Gallery, (see The CJN, Oct. 22, 1992), Sergey Malina has produced a series of graphics employing some new and different techniques.

His subjects are often biblical but there are also a number of interesting studies of faces and serveral charming and attractive landscapes.

Some are done in an unusual combination of drypoint and watercolor; others are monotypes, etchings and pen-and-ink drawings. Many are original and some come in small, limited editions.

They are marked contrast to the large oils of his earlier show, revealing him to be versatile and, like Doyle, an extremely well-trained artist.

Fifteen of Malinas' oil paintings are also currently on view at the Kaspar Gallery in the Yorkville area of Toronto.

Both these artists show great promise and should be watched with interest.

From Russia With Art: Works on Paper and Canvas continues at the Westdale Gallery, 860 King St. W. in Hamilton, until Sunday, Feb. 20.

Gallery hours are Tuesday through Saturday, 10 a.m. to 5:30 p.m., and by appointment. For information phone (905) 523-5156.

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

Born in Vienna in 1882, Melanie Klein became a dominant figure in British psychoanalytic circles from the 1920s until her death in 1960. A pioneer in the psychoanalysis of children, she explored the psychic reality of the infant and introduced the concept of breast envy. Toronto biographer Phyllis Grosskurth's definitive biography of Klein was published in 1986.

On Feb. 8, the acclaimed English play Mrs. Klein, by Nicholas Wright, begins previews at Toronto's Tarragon Theatre, 30 Bridgman Ave. (near Dupont & Bathurst). The play opens Feb. 15 and runs until March 20. Mrs. Klein is a drama that focuses on the influential Jewish psychoanalyst through the action of a single critical day — the day in 1934 when she learned of the death of her eldest son in a climbing accident. The event sharpens the conflict between Klein and her daughter, Melitta, an analyst who opposes her mother's work.

Melanie and Melitta Klein are played by Joan and Sarah Orenstein, professional actresses who are mother and daughter in real life.

Tickets are $14 during previews, and $18 to $23 during the run, with PWYC ("Pay-What-You-Can") Sunday matinees. For reservations, call 531-1827.

Familiar to television audiences, Justin Louis plays the quick-witted psychiatric patient Randle McMurphy in the 30th anniversary production of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, which opened last week at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St.

Adapted by Dale Wasserman from the novel by Ken Kesey, the play chronicles the match of wits between McMurphy, a petty criminal who goes to a mental hospital instead of prison, and Big Nurse Ratched (Holly Dennison).

Louis, who appeared in Naked Lunch and other film productions by David Cronenberg, also played the lead in the TV series Urban Cowboy, which lasted two seasons on CBC and CBS. His appearance in Cuckoo's Nest marks his debut on the "legit stage."

One Flew Over The Cuckoo's Nest runs until Feb. 13. It was produced and directed by Reva Stern. Tickets ($14.50 to $22) are available from the Leah Posluns Theatre (630-6752) or Ticketmaster (872-1111).

More Theatre Notes: Der Yiddisher Mikado — The Yiddish Mikado is coming to Harbord Collegiate Auditorium, 286 Harboard St., for three performances only. The Friends of Yiddish are presenting the Canadian premiere of this unique production of the Gilbert & Sullivan classic, performed by the Light Opera Company of Long Island. The show opens Saturday March 5 at 8 p.m. and plays twice on Sunday March 6, at 2 and 7:30 p.m. Tickets cost $18 and are available from Ticketmaster, Israel's Judaica Centres, and Lasting Impressions, 243 Wilmington Ave. To attend the opening night gala, phone 635-2883, ext. 700.

A play entitled The Brady Bunch Live opened Jan. 26 at the Bathurst Street Theatre, 736 Bathurst St., Toronto. This stage satire features painstaking re-enactments of actual episodes of the droll 1970s TV sitcom. "Yes, it was bad TV, but we loved it," explains co-producer Robin Payne. Did we really?

Closing Words: In the fashion of one of this column's illustrious predecessors, I would like to "bow out" this week with some words from the late Yiddish writer Isaac Bashevis Singer, who would have been 90 this year. The winner of the Nobel Prize in 1978, the revered Yiddishist was a prolific writer who once claimed, "My imagination has been overstimulated all my life by life itself."

Singer fled Poland in 1935 and never returned, not even after his critical and commercial success. In his later years he explained that he could not bear to see Poland "without my people ... I am afraid I will have to continue to write about the Poland that I remember. After all, literature is about the past."

Books

By BERNARD BASKIN

The History Of Hell, by Alice K. Turner (Harcourt Brace, $29.95).

Judaism's belief in reward and punishment in the afterlife received its greatest emphasis in the post-Biblical period. God was just and if the wicked weren't punished or the righteous rewarded in this life then the defect would be remedied in the world to come.

The Hebrew term for the abode assigned to the righteous was called Gan Eden or Garden of Eden. The Hebrew term for Hell was "Gehinnom," an actual valley south of Jerusalem where community refuse was burned and where, in times past, children were sacrificially burned for the pagan idol Moloch.

The often detailed descriptions of paradise and hell were regarded by most Jewish scholars as purely imaginative and not to be taken literally. Where was hell located? Some placed it in the nethermost part of the earth, others "behind the dark mountains" and still others "above the firmament." But even those who insisted on the need for punishment in the afterlife restricted the time to 12 months. That is why the recitation of the Kaddish for a parent was reduced from a year to 11 months, in order to indicate that the loved one was not a suitable candidate for the maximum penalty.

Rabbi Judah Loew of Prague (1512-1609) taught that the hereafter was a state of bodiless existence and neither its rewards nor its punishments were physical. Its joys were union with God, its miseries were alienation from God which corresponds to what traditionally described as hell.

For Rabbi Abraham Kook, onetime chief rabbi of Palestine, the concepts of heaven and hell, if taken literally, are unworthy of a spiritual person. They should, he said, remind us figuratively that there are important stakes in what we do with our lives.

During the Middle Ages Jews were influenced by the beliefs of their Christian neighbors about the torments of hell. As a result similar lurid depictions of the afterlife found their place in Jewish literature. For the Christian clergy the threat of hellfire was a powerful weapon in keeping their parishioners devout and faithful.

Chassidism made it part of its folklore that every soul must obtain purification to be saved from Gehinnom. This process can be brought about by reincarnation as the soul migrates from body to body. Suffering in this world was considered a kind of "purgatory" for sins committed in a previous existence.

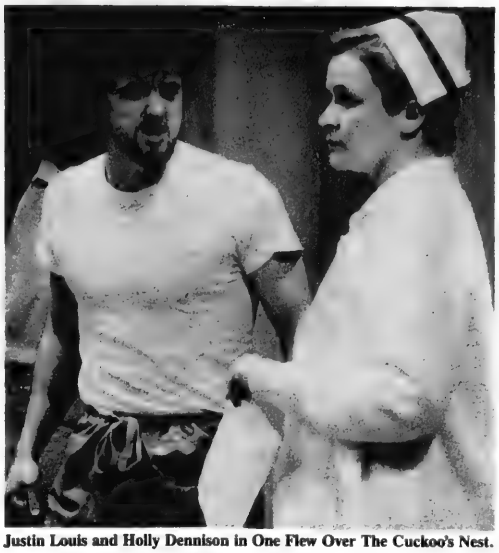
According to a recent poll, 60 per cent of Canadians believe in hell (although only four per cent think they're likely to wind up there).

The book under review is a survey of hell over a period of 4,000 years. The author takes the reader on a trip through a great number of underworlds beginning in Sumeria and moving on to Egyptian, Greek, Roman Gnostic and Judeo-Christian images of the netherworld. Dante gave enhanced significance to hell in his classic works, inspiration for similar poetic flights by Goethe, Milton, Byron, Rimbaud and many others.

Unfortunately, this lively work devotes little time or space to theology or psychology or to the deeper mythological aspects of the subject. What is most noteworthy about this handsome volume are the fascinating 62 illustrations, 37 in full color. All in all this is a stimulating, if rather superficial, contribution to the evolution of human thinking about that baleful place of evil and suffering.

Cuckoo's Nest puts social issue into an entertaining context

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter



Justin Louis and Holly Dennison in One Flew Over The Cuckoo's Nest.

TORONTO — The 1960s gave us more than Woodstock, that symbol of a sea change in lifestyles. It gave us Ken Kesey's One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, the novel which harpooned psychiatric treatment, and, as a bonus, gave us the subtext of the erosion of native Indians' rights and lands.

Sound familiar? It should, for Dale Wasserman's play, based on the novel, running at the Leah Posluns Theatre until Feb. 13, is getting better as it ages.

"Things haven't changed much in the 30 years since the play was first presented," said director Reva Stern, "except that now they're turfing the patients out of the hospital into the community."

This is the third time Stern has put this play on the boards, the first at Beth Tikvah Synagogue and the second at the Leah Posluns in 1978. This reviewer, who has seen all three, believes this one is the best. Trimmed down to two acts from three, a full 25 minutes shorter, it has more dramatic tension, more suspense, more humor and more social conscience.

One Flew Over The Cuckoo's Nest is a textbook example of magnificent playwriting. This is why the rebellious patient Randle McMurphy, played flawlessly by Justin Louis, grows moment by moment in stature as he begins to understand the other patients in the day ward, particularly Chief Bromden, the Indian patient who the staff thinks is a deaf mute. Terry Harford, who is not a Canadian Indian, gives a compelling performance as the chief, his huge bulk overshadowing the major theme, as it should.

Louis, the 27-year-old star of the TV show Urban Angel, appearing on the legitimate stage for the first time, grew up in the neighborhood of the mental hospital 999 Queen St. W., and used to play in the park around it.

"In TV less is more, so I was glad to tackle a role like this with all the physical action it requires, and I like the excitement of the audience reaction," Louis told The CJN.

Holly Dennison gives a softer shading than the traditional one to the role of Nurse Ratched (so aptly named), McMurphy's protaganist and the figure that Kesey used to represent the iron and unforgiving will of the establishment. "I think she thought she was doing the right thing, but of course the patients finally realized otherwise," Dennison said, after opening night.

Among the supporting cast, Donald Adams as Harding, the sophisticated patient who quotes Freud at the drop of a hat, drew attention like a magnet. His Second City training stood him in good stead as did his own volunteer experience in leading an actors' workshop in an Ontario mental hospital. Even though Harding's lines are among the funniest in the play, they are also the needles pricking the pretensions of modern day psychiatry.

A glassed-in nursing station dominates an effective set designed by Samantha Burson and the lighting and sound by Allan McMillan contributes much to a play depending on emotional levels, both on and off stage.

The genius of One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest is that it not only tackles a relevant social issue but is a cracking good story and an entertaining evening of theatre.

Neil Simon captures zany days of live television's golden age

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Neil Simon's new comedy, autobiographical like much of his work, looks back with reverential affection on the last days of the golden age of live television comedy (the 1950s). Simon, along with zany colleagues like Mel Brooks, Carl Reiner, Woody Allen, Larry Gelbert, Mel Tolkin and the only woman, ex-Torontonian Lucille Kallen, was a comedy writer for Sid Caesar on Your Show of Shows, and later Caesar's Hour. They were beyond question the greatest stable of comedy writers ever assembled.

In those days Caesar and Company created the equivalent of a full-scale Broadway show each week. Saturday night in America was a major social event. Across North America, neighbors shared boxy 10-inch TVs, watching Caesar play everything from Chaplinesque pantomimes to satirical husband and wife sketches with sidekicks Imogene Coca or Nanette Fabray, to lampoons of operas and movies (remember From Here to Obscurity?) Even Albert Einstein was a fan of the show. In fact Broadway movie owners asked NBC to switch the program to the middle of the week on the grounds that it was ruining business.

Caesar's reign as king of comedy lasted eight years, during which time he headlined the two best comedy shows of the century — so when you're talking living legend you're talking Sid Caesar. Simon recently confided, "Sid Caesar was the only genius I ever knew."

Laughter On The 23rd Floor is Neil Simon's two-and-a-half-hour chronicle of what went on in the writing room at the time he was writing for Your Show of Shows. That was 40 years ago, and as the characters suggest at the end of the play, nothing like this extraordinary period will likely ever be seen again. Simon and his fellow writers were young; they had the time of their lives doing what they loved, and as a bonus had the good luck to get paid for doing it. Their lively office on the 23rd floor overlooking 57th Street in Manhattan was crammed with mad comic genius, and the zingy repartee was virtually bouncing off the walls.

The wonderful cast of this very funny play is headed by Nathan Lane, who plays the Caesar-like character Max Prince with impeccable timing and delivery. Credit Jerry Zak's inspired direction for assembling a superb ensemble of talented actors and getting the best out of each and every one of them.

If you like a play that is rapid-fire funny, bristling with Yiddish/showbiz humor, you'll love this tribute of Neil Simon's to the tormented genius of Sid Caesar.

Appearing for an indefinite run at Richard Rodgers Theatre, 226 West 46th Street.

For tickets call Ticketmaster (212) 307-4100.

Taken at last year's cottage show, this picture illustrates some of the exhibit's attractions.

Prime deals in cottage country

PICKERING — There are deals to be found in and around cottage country. Today one can choose from literally hundreds of quality cottage properties within a two-hour drive of Toronto. These are road-accessible waterfront cottages.

With mortgage rates at approximately 7.5 per cent, an $85,000 property with $25,000 down would carry at only $495 per month. Now is the best time to look at buying recreational property. Consider the following reasons.

There is a limited amount of waterfront property within two hours of Toronto. Waterfront cannot be created, and the cottage ratepayers groups are very anti-development. Generally, cottages are kept in families for many years and often passed down.

However, the recession has forced many cottage owners to unwillingly liquidate a valued family asset, creating a supply surge and anxious sellers. This results in lower prices. Buying activity has only to increase about 10 per cent and much of this property will be sold, thus alleviating the surplus.

Another factor influencing the purchasing of recreational property is the fact that baby boomers are quickly approaching cottage-purchasing age. This will result in a major surge in cottage activity within the next three to five years.

There have been significant highway improvements recently which reduced travel time to out-of-the-way areas. Twenty years ago, Highway 11 to Bracebridge-Huntsville was a long, slow, two-lane road, not the divided highway it is today. The improvement in road conditions has brought more people to the area over the last 15 years, driving up demand and prices.

The most recent highway improvement is in the Peterborough-Lindsay area. Highway 115-35 used to be a very busy, dangerous stretch. Today it is four lanes almost all the way to Lakefield and Lindsay. This has improved access to eastern areas and prices have not really begun to reflect this. It is even possible to buy on a major Trent System lake like Stoney Lake for under $99,000.

Anyone travelling to Parry Sound over the last few years will have noticed construction along Highway 69. It is being widened to four lanes for quite a distance and eventually, probably all the way to Parry Sound. With this improvement, Parry Sound represents good value for under $99,000 as well.

The best values may be found in the smaller lakes, in and around areas such as Parry Sound, Mactier, Minden, Haliburton, Apsley, Bancroft and Madoc. The fallen prices, combined with the low interest rates, have made cottage property more obtainable than ever.

Buying or building a "shell" (unwinterized) cottage is a great way to begin. By installing a $1,200 envirotoilet, a $500 pump and an $800 wood stove, you are ready for three-season fun. As years go by, you can budget improvements and additions as finances allow. Build a dock one year; renovate your kitchen the next.

In the '80s, if one had $40,000, the tendancy was to use those funds as a down payment for a $200,000 property. No time was spent learning or investigating the alternative. It was "buy now or you'll miss out." Today people are using the $40,000 to buy a $75,000 cottage and add to it over time. It's much more sensible.

Perhaps the best place to access available cottages is the Cottage Show which will be running from Feb. 4-6 at the Metro East Trade Centre in Pickering, Ont.

Company scans phone bills to determine calling patterns

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Reducing operating costs and improving a company's communications system is a priority for most business people, but with the introduction of competition in the telecommunications industry it is easy to become confused about choosing the best system for one's needs.

Fortunately, IPC Inter-National Planning Communications Ltd. has come up with a unique solution to help Canada's business community come to grips with the confusion created by this competition.

For the last several months, the company has used the latest in industrial scanning technology along with its own developed software to scan a company's phone bills in order to determine calling patterns and frequency.

"Not only is our service unbiased, but the unique design and flexibility of our software combined with our engineering ability and experience in telecommunications, allows us to apply it to areas that go beyond just voice, such as fax, cellular long distance, calling card, fraudulent and abuse calling, and erroneous billing," says Elizabeth Stephen, president and CEO.

Stephen — whose partners include Samuel Wong, vice-president, operations; Eugenia Yau, director of research and development; and Jay Cohen, manager of sales and marketing — says one advantage of being an independent, privately-owned telecommunications firm is that

Improves business connection

"when carriers and resellers realize we are not competing with them, they allow us to include their up-to-date rates in our software which means we can make 'apples to apples' comparisons. The result is that everyone wins, particularly the users."

She stresses, however, that cost is not the only consideration when choosing a system. Each has its advantages and short-comings. "Getting the right match for a business's needs from the start helps both the client and the vendors in their planning and positioning."

Cohen says because they do not receive compensation from carriers or resellers, they work strictly in their clients' interests. "Our billing is cost effective, and we bill according to the amount of work, the complexity and time involved in each study. We will not even make a proposal if we are not confident our client can recapture the cost of our study within several months and/or vastly improve their telecommunications situation."

He says he is often asked about the best carrier but "I cannot say what is best because I have a different answer for every client. What it all comes down to is calling patterns — such factors as where they are calling, the nature of their calls and when the calls are being made. IPC makes the right match and minimizes risks."

Stephen says today's telecommunications industry is competitive but it changes so quickly that "we haven't even seen competition yet. There will be a lot more choices and it will become harder and harder to choose. We are able to help companies choose the right system so that they can reduce their operating costs and improve their communications."

Double Digit Inflation

TEL AVIV — Israel's cost-of-living index rose 11.2 per cent in December, bringing the total rate of inflation for 1993 to 11.25 per cent.

The rate was 9.4 per cent in 1992. Housing costs, which jumped almost 24 per cent last year, were cited as a main reason for the overall increase.

Background Information Released

OTTAWA — The Department of Finance recently issued two background publications — Canada's Economic Challenges and Government Revenues in Canada — that provide Canadians with factual information on the nation's economic and fiscal situation.

They follow up on Finance Minister Paul Martin's commitment of last November to provide basic facts on issues of importance for the pre-budget consultation process.

Investing In Israeli Tourism

TEL AVIV — Expectations of a booming future for tourism in Israel, which in 1993 for the first time attracted two million visitors, is stimulating widespread investor interest.

To facilitate public participation in this growth sector, Lahak Mutual Funds, which are part of the Bank Hapoalim Mutual Fund Group, launched Lahak Tourism. The new fund will invest 50 per cent in the tourist industry in Israel and abroad.

A number of tourism-oriented corporations have recently issued shares on the Tel Aviv Stock Market. Bank Hapoalim officials predict this trend will be strengthened in the coming year.

The anticipated implementation of the agreement between Israel and the Palestinians will make Israel one of the preferred international tourist destinations. To serve this market, major investments in the development of tourist facilities are already being planned.

Jobless Rate Up But Down

JERUSALEM — There were two per cent more people looking for work in December 1993 than there were in November, according to statistics released by the Labor and Social Affairs Ministry.

Labor and Social Affairs Minister Ora Namir, who for months has been warning that there is insufficient growth in the economy to absorb the unemployed, released the figures in a way that backed her argument.

While the number of job-seekers, seasonally adjusted, climbed to 117,800 from 115,500 in November, that same monthly figure for December was 124,400.

However, when compared to the 1992 figure of 142,500 a drop of 18,100 or 12 per cent is reported.

On A Positive Note

TORONTO — Toronto Real Estate Board (TREB) members reported 2,922 sales of single-family dwellings last month.

This number represents an encouraging 37 per cent increase over sales from the previous year and the best December sales figures since 1988, says president Ron Bluestein.

The Toronto-area market closed out 1993 with a total of 38,990 sales — down only seven per cent from 1992 year-end totals.

Bluestein says despite the slow start in 1993, sales in November and Devember posted healthy increases over prior year sales and this should lead into an active spring market.

Typically December's sales are down marginally from November as a result of the holiday season.

Program Extended Indefinitely

OTTAWA —Ontario Finance Minister Floyd Laughren announced recently that the Ontario Home Ownership Savings Plan (OHOSP) program will be extended indefinitely.

The program was to end on Dec. 31, 1993.

The Land Transfer Tax (LTT) program that refunded eligible homebuyers' LTT will not be continued. LTT refunds will be available only to those who opened plans before Jan. 1, 1994.

For those who already have an OHOSP the rules have not changed. These planholders may still be eligible for the LTT refund. All dates for plans opened before Jan. 1 still apply — plans must be closed and a home purchased by Dec. 31, 1999.

For plans opened after Dec. 31, an individual may make contributions for five consecutive years and the plan must be closed and a home purchased by the end of the sixth year.

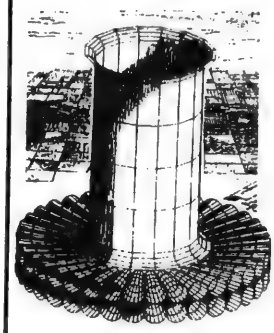
There is no limit to the amount that can be contributed to the plan. However, the amount that can be contributed for the OHOSP Tax Credit remains at $2,000 per person or $4,000 per couple.

New measuring system

By JOLIE GREIFF

Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — MACS, an acronym for Measurement and Control Systems, is a company recently founded in Jerusalem by Dr. Ernst Bromberg and five engineers, all of whom worked together for 10 years in Baku, Azerbaijan, before arriving in Israel.



The team has developed a tank gauging system, used to measure liquids and gases contained in a wide range of storage tanks, including the measurements of leakage from underground tanks.

The MACS system is vital in the petrochemical industry, for example, which requires accurate control of liquids, such as gasoline, in storage tanks and pipes.

Alexander Bulkhman, MACS project manager, said the new system is far less dependent on outside factors and performs as accurately as existing systems without any increase in cost.

The MACS tank gauging system prototype will be completed shortly. The scientists believe they will be ready to compete internationally. The company has received funding from European investors, as well as from Israel's Ministry of Industry and Trade.

The Bonds-RRSP connection is an investment option

TORONTO — There's going to be an Israeli twist to this year's Registered Retirement Savings Plan (RRSP) rush.

In the past, Israel Bonds and retirement savings plans were disconnected investments. RRSP purchasers had no reason to think about Bonds, as they hurried to meet the Feb. 28 deadline. However, this year, for the first time, Bonds can be combined with Canada's most popular tax shelters.

Under new tax regulation amendments, Israel Bonds qualify for inclusion in RRSP and Registered Retirement Income Fund (RRIF) portfolios. RRIF is a tax-sheltered plan into which Canadians can collapse RRSP proceeds at age 71.

"Because of the regulation changes, Bonds themselves can be tax-exempt," says Debra Thuet, who chairs the Bonds/RRSP advisory committee.

Israel Bonds can generate tax savings if an RRSP is self-directed. This means plan participants can hold as many RRSP investments as they like in a single account. Bonds have become one of those investments.

It is actually possible to transfer a previously-purchased Bond into an RRSP account. According to Thuet, it's becoming a popular thing to do.

"A lot of people are taking Bonds, mostly in small denominations, out of their safety deposit boxes for placement in their RRSP portfolio."

By moving Bonds in this way, investors benefit from an increased RRSP deduction without spending any extra money. At the same time, interest income on the Bonds themselves is tax sheltered.

There are also other options: buying Bonds first and then contributing them to a self-directed RRSP; or purchasing Bonds from funds already in an RRSP.

No matter how Bonds and RRSPs are linked, the government has imposed some restrictions. For the 1993 taxation year, the purchase cost of the Bonds cannot exceed 18 per cent of an RRSP's book value.

Israel Bonds offices are now working with several financial brokers, consultants and institutions because RRSPs are so widespread.

In Toronto, Canada-Israel Securities account executive Marcia Cohen has been busy researching the procedures that each institution is using to make the Bonds-RRSP connection as simple as possible. Because Canadians tend to think of RRSPs at the last minute, methods are being worked out for procrastinating investors to receive all possible tax benefits even if they take action only days before Feb. 28.

Cohen reports the demand is heavy.

"We probably get a dozen calls a day. In the last couple of weeks, there hasn't been a day without a transfer or sale."

Israel Bonds is sponsoring a public seminar on RRSPs and RRIFs in Toronto on Feb. 8. More informations is available from the State of Israel Bonds office at (416)789-3351.

Tips From Pros

TORONTO — "A helping hand for the private investor."

That's the way the Financial Post describes the Canadian Shareowners Association (CSA) and its educational programs for individual investors.

The CSA's sole purpose is to show investors how to identify quality growth stocks when they are on sale. This approach allows investors to obtain superior returns and be in control of their portfolio.

Started in 1987, the 6,000 member CSA is one of a world-wide network of 14 national non-profit associations of investors. John Bart PhD, founder of the CSA, attributes its growth to the common sense appeal of the Association's four investing principles, its Stock Selection Guide (the Guide), and its Commission-Free Investing Program.

The principles are straight-forward.

(1) Invest regularly for long-term gains. Bart says that, "No one, not even the 'professionals' can consistently time the market's short-term ups and downs. So typical individual investors should be looking for superior performance over a 3-5 year period."

(2) Reinvest gains and dividends. Reinvesting returns lets the power of compounding accelerate the growth of a portfolio.

(3) Diversify. Put the right kinds of stocks in your portfolio to minimize unavoidable risks.

However, Bart notes that, "Investing regularly, reinvesting and diversifying in 'junk' stocks will not produce the superior returns you want. The Guide lets you implement the fourth and most essential principle for obtaining superior returns."

(4) Invest only in high-quality growth stocks when they are on sale. "It's the ease with which the Guide helps investors to readily identify stocks with the potential for superior returns and those that investors want to avoid," that Bart says really inspired him to start the Association. The Guide has proven itself in obtaining superior returns.

"Between July 1988 and Jan. 1993, stocks chosen using the Guide and featured in the Canadian Shareowner magazine experienced an average gain of 29 per cent versus only 19 per cent for the TSE 300 Index."

The CSA provides members with a variety of investment tools so they can earn superior returns.

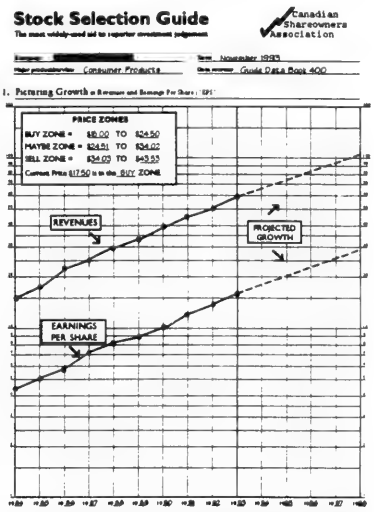
The proven Stock Selection Guide is an investment tool that shows investors what to buy and when to sell. It provides a structure for developing judgements which determine whether a stock's current price is in the buy, sell or maybe zone.

The Stock Selection Manual provides clear step-by-step instructions for completing Stock Selection Guides. Other topics covered in the manual include how to follow a stock's performance to know when to sell.

Investment decisions

The bi-monthly Canadian Shareowner magazine contains ideas for stocks to study, and always features two companies of current interest — with completed Stock Selection Guides. Other features include: Fundamental and Technical Market Outlook; Portfolio Coach; Back-to-Basics; and Insider Trading Data

The Guide Data Book 400 includes all of the historical financial data needed to complete guides on over 400 companies. Use this data and the Guide to test the stocks already in your portfolio and those that come to your attention.



The stock illustrated in the guide shows quality growth. Furthermore, its current price is in the buy zone. The guide shows this is the stock to buy.

The Commission-Free Investing Program provides CSA members with a simple and inexpensive way to begin building positions in many well-known Canadian and U.S. companies — without commissions. Some of the participating companies are Imperial Oil, Northern Telecom, Imasco and Upjohn.

In a TV Ontario feature on the CSA, John Berrys, the founding President of the Association's Toronto Chapter described the appeal of the CSA's educational program this way:

"Sensible people often spend half a day or more shopping for a new suit, jewellery or other item costing hundreds of dollars, and yet these same people invest several thousand dollars in a stock without investing even an hour of their time studying its investment merits. . . The CSA Guide helps investors follow a disciplined approach to studying a stock's fundamentals without wasting a lot of time."

Financial security is of primary concern for most investors. The CSA addresses this concern by providing members with the skills, tools and knowledge necessary to make consistent, successful investment decisions.

More information can be obtained from the Association at 1090 University Ave., Windsor, ON N9A 5S4.

CSA is Canada's non-profit educational association that serves individual investors and investment clubs.

Recession slows down school construction

Netivot opens; others hopeful

By DEBORAH LIGHTSTONE
Special to The CJN

Many of the Toronto-area Jewish day schools are forging ahead with the construction of new buildings, even though more than half of the 12 community-funded schools have operating deficits, and parental demand for tuition subsidies continues to be high because of the recession.

"Five of the 12 schools have been breaking even. Three have an accumulated deficit that has been covered by bank loans or mortgages. Four others have a shortfall which they have been meeting with internal endowments or surpluses," said Bernard Shoub, director of school finances at the Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

The BJE, an agency of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, oversees the fiscal operation of those Jewish schools which receive communal funding.

The bulk of the operating tab for the Jewish day schools is paid by the students' parents. Full annual tuition fees range from $5,700 and up for the elementary grades, to $8,500 and up for high school.

Shoub estimates that at the elementary school level, tuition paid by parents accounts for 85-95 per cent of the income collected by the school. At the high school level, the parents' share drops to between 45 and 65 per cent. Those figures vary from school to school, with the BJE and individual school fundraising campaigns paying the difference.

The percentage of students who are given tuition subsidies has risen over the past several years.

In 1989-90, 37.9 per cent of students in communally-funded schools got financial assistance. That figure rose each year over the next four years until it reached a peak of 43 per cent in 1992-93. For the current 1993-94 school year, the percentage has dropped a little to 42.3 per cent.

This, academic year, the communally-funded schools submitted budgets asking the BJE for a total of $10.2 million, the difference between their costs and what the parents could pay. The BJE's recommendation, based on its own formula, was to allocate them $9.2 million. Federation was only able to give them $6.5 million.

Gym teacher Liliane Rende takes a grade 2 class through its paces at Netivot HaTorah's new facility in Thornhill. See also story page 47. [Alron photo]

This, Shoub explained, reflected the approximately 7 percent drop in appropriations for most communal functions. In the 1992-93 year, the schools asked for $10.9 million. BJE recommended that they receive $9.3 million, and the final allotment was $7 million.

How are the schools coping?

Shoub says they are doing some very tight budgeting. For example, they save money by purchasing bulk school supplies and materials through the North York School Board rather than from regular retail outlets; they have done some tough negotiating with their janitorial suppliers; and some schools have negotiated their 1993-94 teachers' contract with no across-the-board salary increases.

They have also boosted their fundraising efforts, but according to Shoub, they haven't increased their results.

"Too many people are competing for the same dollar," he said.

The individual schools, not the BJE, are responsible for any annual operating deficits and for capital expenditures.

And despite the tough times, many schools have launched ambitious expansion projects.

Associated Hebrew Day Schools, with about 3,000 students Toronto's largest Jewish day school network, is currently constructing a new campus on Atkinson Avenue north of Centre Street in Thornhill. The estimated cost is $10 million. The approximately 100,000 square foot facility will be able to house about 1,000 children from Nursery through Grade 6.

According to Associated president Dr. Harry Krakowsky, the building is currently 'closed in' — the roof is on, the exterior walls, floors and windows are there, and the mechanical and heating systems are roughed in.

But he will not venture a target date for the building's completion, because construction of the Thornhill campus is linked to three other projects.

First and foremost, it is linked to the sale of the Associated site on Neptune, and the subsequent erection of a senior citizens' assisted-housing building as well as a new, small Associated branch.

According to Sheldon Goodman, a vice-president of Associated and chair of the Neptune Building Committee, permission has already been received to rezone the Neptune site.

In August of 1993, Associated and the Baycrest Hospital jointly submitted an application to the Ontario Ministry of Housing for construction of a seniors' housing project under the Jobs Ontario program. If the government approves the application, the property would be sold to a non-profit corporation, managed by Baycrest, which would handle the construction and running of the seniors' project.

Associated estimates the sale of the Neptune property to that corporation will generate $4 million.

Goodman noted it could take three to six months to get the ministry's response.

The building of the new Thornhill campus is also linked to two other projects:

- Renovation of the Hurwich (Finch Avenue) branch to accommodate a junior high.
- Renovation of the Leslie Avenue branch to accommodate the administration of the Associated schools.

Community committed to education

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

Despite the recession, the Toronto Jewish community continued to demonstrate its commitment to Jewish education, Rabbi Irwin Witty, executive director, Toronto Board of Jewish Education, told The CJN in a review of the past year.

With a day school enrolment of 9,662 and a supplementary school attendance of 6,094, the total for the year was 15,756. The overall figure was 54 lower than last year, reflecting a drop of about 100 in supplementary school attendance, and offset by an increase of 43 in the day school enrolment. The total figure for elementary schools was 8,272, and for high schools, 1,390, both up slightly.

Though the day school figures are precise, enrolment in the supplementary ones has to be "guesstimated" to some extent, Rabbi Witty pointed out.

In addition to the above, there are 235 youngsters in Hebrew classes in the Ministry of Education's Heritage program, primarily in North York.

Nor is the enrolment in two private (Jewish) schools reflected in the totals as they are not affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education owing to a Board policy not to affiliate schools without a constitution and accountability process.

The elementary schools functioned in 20 different locations, the Associated, Eitz Chaim and United Synagogue day schools all having multiple sites.

The eight high schools, with the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto leading the way, also included a significant enrolment at Beth Jacob High School.

Despite continued growth, the Jewish school enrolment represents only 50 per cent of the total number of Jewish youngsters in the city at any given time. But, Rabbi Witty explained, this figure is misleading because some children drop out after a few years, or drop back in, so that the Board's estimate is that 85 to 90 per cent of Jewish children have some contact with the Jewish school system.

The Board would like to see more children of recent immigrants in the system, Rabbi Witty said, noting that the number of children from the former Soviet Union is below the 50 per cent figure of the total population. The enrolment from the South African community is also below that level.

Accessibility to Jewish day schools for families in outlying areas is a continuing problem.

On the financial side, Jewish day schools are confronting a serious situation, the executive director said, because for the 1993-94 academic year, aid from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto was cut by seven per cent on a global basis, meaning that some of the hard-pressed schools had to deal with a reduction in their aid allocation of from 15 to 20 per cent.

This resulted even though the Board trimmed $1.5 million from the $10.8 million of aid originally requested by the schools for the 1993-94

Series teens are now in high school

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

It's now two years since The CJN first focused on four Toronto students as part of a long-term series to be completed in the year 2000. Naomi Emerson, Alison Bresver, Jacob Korenblum and Chaim Greenwald appeared in this paper in January 1992 as 12 and 13-year-olds, on the cusp of Jewish adulthood, and of their teenage years. and of their teenage years.

Two years later, all are now in high school. They continue to represent a diversity of backgrounds within the Jewish community.

• • •

Naomi Emerson, 14, graduated last June as Associated Hebrew Schools' athlete of the year and Hebrew valedictorian. She finds Ulpanat Orot, the Orthodox (Bnei Akiva) girls' high school she now attends, "very different from Associated."

Not that she's unhappy, although she's had to get used to a heavier workload and a stricter dress code than at Associated, as well as to being in an all-girl school.

She finds that her fellow students "are more themselves with no guys around" and says that the atmosphere at Ulpana is "more homey," partly due to the small size of the classes (there are 18 in her class) and partly because she finds a number of the teachers very approachable. "You can just speak to them if you have a problem," she says.

Naomi is pleased that a school basketball team is being organized. "We asked our teacher if we could have one," she says, smiling. When interviewed in December, she was looking forward to trying out for the team in January. Naomi spent most of first term recovering from a painful ankle injury sustained during a late summer basketball game.

Naomi was also looking forward to participating fully in thrice-weekly gym classes. Her 42.5-hour school week includes a full secular curriculum as well as subjects such as Mishna, Torah and Hebrew language.

Unlike their male counterparts at Or Chaim, students at Ulpanat Orot do not have classes on Sunday. The girls don't learn Gemara, explains Naomi, who is grateful to have her Sunday mornings free.

Naomi, whose family is Orthodox, believes that while women should have a [Jewish and secular] education "for sure," she "doesn't believe in women rabbis" and doesn't think that women should lead services.

Last Purim Naomi went to a women-only megillah reading, which she found "sort of awkward. I wasn't used to women reading the megillah." She added that she doesn't think they should read it in front of a whole congregation.

Naomi Emerson

Although her school day includes daily tefillah (prayers), Naomi says it's not the same thing. "We more daven to ourselves. We don't say it out loud together, and we don't read from the Torah."

Naomi, like the other youngsters profiled in this series, isn't thinking too much about her own future these days. "I'm focusing on my workload," she says.

She finds "amazing" the fall of Canada's Progressive Conservative party last year as well as the signing of the Israel-PLO peace accord. She expressed concerns about the latter: "I don't think Arafat could just turn around and be peace-loving, and even if he does, there are so many Arab groups who aren't. I think [the peace process] should be slower, more gradual."

Alison Bresver, also known as Ali, is in her first year at Lawrence Park Collegiate. Although she had planned to enter the enriched program at Northern Secondary School, she changed her mind so that she could continue in French immersion as she did at Glenview Public School.

"I really like it," says 14-year-old Ali enthusiastically of her first year in high school. She enjoys being in a bigger school around older students.

Ali is continuing her Jewish education at Temple Emanu-El's supplementary school. She attends pre-Confirmation classes which are held every other week on Sunday afternoon. The class year includes three weekend retreats as well as a trip to New York at the end of the year, following studies on immigration to the New World.

"We're learning a lot about Jewish history," says Ali. "The difference between shtetls and ghettos is one thing we've learned. [Teachers Ashley Myerson and Lyn Kaplan] make it fun to learn. They find activities for us to do, like debates. It gets it into our heads better than if they would just [lecture] to us."

Being a Reform Jew is particularly meaningful to Ali because of the role that women play in Reform Judaism. "You get to have a real bat mitzvah," she says, explaining that to her a "real" bat mitzvah includes reading from the Torah.

"I've been to other bat mitzvahs where the girl won't even sit on the bimah and is called up to say a prayer or something. I don't think that's right. I think you deserve to read from the Torah and it shouldn't matter what sex you are, because it's a part of our heritage. It's been passed down, and it's a very important part of being Jewish. The Torah is sacred.

"I think if I didn't have a bat mitzvah, I probably would not care about being Jewish so much. I probably would not still be in Confirmation [class] or in my Jewish youth group [at Temple Emanu-El].

Alison Bresver

"It's important to me to be Jewish. I don't know what my beliefs are really. I don't go to synagogue that often, but I'm sort of thinking about that a lot now. I'm trying to figure out what I believe."

Ali has discussed God with her friends, most of whom are Christian. "We're old enough to think things through and not just [believe something] because our parents tell us."

One of the issues that was discussed in her pre-Confirmation class was intermarriage. "I didn't really think about it [before]. I think if you're in love, you marry whoever you want to. I'd still keep up being Jewish, but I'm not going to walk around looking for someone Jewish. I don't see anything wrong with interdating. My parents, of course, prefer that I marry someone Jewish, but they wouldn't be mad or not talk to me if I [married a non-Jew]."

Jacob Korenblum, 14, has left the Jewish day school system and is now in Grade 9 in the gifted program at Northern Secondary School.

He graduated from Bialik Hebrew Day School as French valedictorian, and is continuing his Jewish studies in a weekly class for high school students taught by Rabbi Larry Pinsker (of the Reconstructionist synagogue Darchei Noam) at the Jewish Community Centre Bloor Y branch.

Among other things, the class has increased Jacob's awareness of women's issues in Judaism. One of the class discussions concerned options for Orthodox women who want an expanded religious role.

"If you're Orthodox, are you supposed to change to Reconstructionist [which offers egalitarian services], or are you supposed to fight for change within the Orthodox movement?" asks Jacob.

The class has enabled him to continue learning about Jewish subjects, so in that way he doesn't miss the Jewish aspect of Bialik, he says. The only thing he lacks now that he's no longer at day school, he says, is the opportunity to speak Hebrew.

Jacob is enjoying his studies at Northern, which include Communication. He recently completed a unit on the psychology of advertising, "stuff I don't normally have time for."

Jacob has maintained his connection to the music world. In 1992 he left the Toronto Children's Chorus, with which he had toured to England and France. On the day he was interviewed, he was singing with their alumni choir. He does at least one concert a year with them, he said. He is also studying Harmony and Flute at the Royal Conservatory of Music.

Jacob Korenblum

Jacob has been an avid viewer of CBC's television news since the Gulf War and followed last fall's federal election with interest.

"I didn't like the fact that the Reform party and the Bloc got so many seats. I think they're too right wing.

"I think [the election results weren't former Prime Minister] Kim Campbell's fault. She was stuck with a lot of problems. I kind of feel sorry for her. It's not like she passed any legislation that would make people hate her." A woman prime minister is "fine with me," said Jacob.

• • •

Chaim Greenwald, 15, says he didn't think Kim Campbell was a very good leader, although he doesn't think being a woman had to do with her defeat. "I don't have anything against women in politics. A woman is capable. It just had to be the right person for the job," says Chaim.

Chaim is now in Grade 10 at Wisconsin Institute of Torah Studies (WITS), a Milwaukee yeshiva where he lives in a dormitory during the school year. He entered the yeshiva last year after completing Grade 8 at Toronto's Eitz Chaim Day School.

When asked about women taking a more prominent role in Jewish religious life, such as becoming rabbis, Chaim answers, "From what I've learned, it's wrong. It's what I was taught, but I agree. [As far as what others] feel is right for them, I'm not going to argue with them as of now."

Chaim Greenwald

Chaim's day at yeshiva runs from 7:30 a.m. to 9 p.m. Monday to Thursday. Friday is a shortened day, and there are classes on Sunday morning. Chaim plays basketball once a week and catches up with his sleep on Shabbat.

Every third week the students have an opportunity to spend Shabbat with a family. Chaim sometimes takes the bus to Chicago, 1 1/2 hours away, to spend Shabbat with the family of a school friend.

About 99 per cent of Chaim's friends are also in yeshiva, he says. He is still in touch with his Toronto friends, some of whom have gone on to Ner Israel Yeshiva, others to Yeshiva Beit Yitzchak in Hamilton.

Chaim's curriculum includes a full secular program. Most of his secular teachers are not Jewish, he reports.

Chaim "will probably" continue his yeshiva education in Israel after he completes Grade 12 at WITS.

Lower costs, fundraising to ease financial crunch

In addition to the $10 million required for the Thornhill campus, $2-$3 million is needed to build the new school on Neptune and to renovate the Hurwich and Leslie branches.

Krakowsky said the school has already received pledges of about $2.5 million.

And he revealed that the school's board of directors has authorized borrowing up to $2.5 million from the bank.

"We felt that's the limit we should borrow that's prudent and fiscally responsible," he said.

Taking into account the $4 million anticipated from the sale of the Neptune property, the pledges to date and the bank loan, that leaves a fund-raising campaign target of about $3.5 million.

Now that the UJA campaign has ended, the Associated campaign will swing into full gear.

Krakowsky said finding the money for the new building will be done "like any other fundraising drive — by person-to-person, face-to-face canvassing."

And he stressed that the parent body will not be forced to pay for the expansion.

"The philosophy of the school is that tuition has never been reflective of capital costs. Tuition covers the operating cost of educating the child, and it is our intention to continue that policy," Krakowsky said.

As for progress on the new building on Atkinson Avenue, Krakowsky admitted that "fundraising is slow, so construction is slow . . . We're very optimistic that we'll be able to raise the money. But we don't want to put the entire school system at risk with a huge indebtedness to the bank."

A short walk away from the new Associated site, on Atkinson Avenue just north of Clark Avenue, is the spanking new campus of Netivot HaTorah.

Executive administrator Alan Steinfeld says the building is "pretty well finished. It's functional and functioning, with only a few specialty rooms to be completed, like the library, which is not furnished yet."

The school has construction financing from the bank, which will be converted to a mortgage, and it has pledges from donors, both parents of students and members of the community at large.

"But we still have to pay the shortfall between the cost of the building and the pledges to date, and we have to do fundraising for carrying the mortgage until it is paid off," Steinfeld noted.

He conceded that "it's a difficult economy to fundraise in, because people are strapped... but the nice part is, construction costs at this time are low."

Steinfeld said Netivot, like Associated, has no plans to change its policy of keeping tuition fees and capital expenses separate.

Adjacent to the new Netivot on Atkinson Avenue is the Leo Baeck Day School's new campus. It will replace the present Kenton Drive branch, and will accommodate Nursery to Grade 8. Total projected cost is $5.6 million, of which the land cost was $1.6 million. The new building will also house the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism.

Zita Gardner, director of Leo Baeck, said the first floor is currently being walled in, the whole building should be closed in by the end of March and should be fully completed by the end of July.

"We'll be in by September 1994. We're right on target," she declared.

The imposition of a building levy on school parents is where Leo Baeck differs from Associated and Netivot HaTorah.

Gardner explained that since 1991, parents have paid a construction levy amounting to half a year's tuition, payable over six years.

The school has also received contributions from Toronto's Reform congregations and from two major donors, the Dan and Koffler families.

Other sources of funding are bank financing and past and ongoing fund-raising drives which draw on school parents as well as the broader community.

"We started a little bit later than the other schools, and we downsized from our original plan — though we did pour a foundation that will allow us to add more classrooms at a future date — but we knew we were going to complete it," Gardner said.

Or Haemet, Ontario's only Sephardi Jewish day school, is also poised to launch a major expansion.

The school has rented premises at the Adath Israel Synagogue near Bathurst Street and Wilson Avenue for more than a decade. This summer it plans to begin construction of a new 70,000 square foot facility on Bathurst north of Steeles.

"This is our first capital expansion. The only way we can grow is by having our own facilities. Right now we don't have a gym, we can't use the building on Sundays and our weekday hours are restricted because the facilities are used by the synagogue," explained Or Haemet president Jacques Benquesus.

He also noted that when the school was founded 18 years ago, most of the Sephardi community lived in the Bathurst corridor between Lawrence and Finch Avenues. Now, he said, most reside north of Finch.

The parcel of land was donated a few years ago by Tony Montemorano of Lakeview Homes.

Benquesus said the estimated cost of the new school is $4.5-$5 million, and it's expected to take 12-18 months to complete.

"We're going to build in phases. We expect to be partly operational in September, 1995. The school will be there, but it won't be completed," Benquesus said.

He said the school's parents are not in a position to fund the expansion, and he hopes to manage without bank financing.

He said the school already has commitments from individuals for more than 50 per cent of the required sum, and a fundraising campaign directed at the Jewish community at large will begin in March.

Benquesus said Or Haemet board members had made a deliberate decision to hold off construction until now, because of the tough economic times.

"Waiting has worked in our favor in two ways. In 1988 we got a construction cost estimate of $8 million. Now it will cost us $4-$5 million. Plus, I think we still have another year of this recession, but by the time we'll have finished building, the recession will be over and people will have more income to contribute."

Unlike the other schools, the United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS) didn't build, they bought.

Until this year, they had always leased their premises, from three synagogues — Beth Tzedec in Forest Hill, Beth Tikvah in the Bayview- Finch area and Shaareh Haim in Richmond Hill.

This past spring, after the Shaareh Haim congregation collapsed in the recession, USDS bought the building from the bank, paying for part of the cost and also obtaining bank financing.

Like most of the other day schools, USDS does not plan to impose a levy on students' parents to pay for the capital expenditure.

But USDS president Dr. Ira Schecter admits it will be much harder raising the money from the parent body and from the community than it was in the mid-80s, when more than $2 million worth of renovations were done to the Bayview and Bathurst campuses.

"It's definitely a harder sell now. But you have to persevere. It boils down to the strength of the identity you can develop between families and their school. If parents want to maintain the school with the right physical facilities and resources, they'll have to dig into their pockets," Schecter said.

"In 1982, my first year on the board, we had a very small — in today's terms — operating deficit, and everyone was hysterical. There was a recession then too, but we reversed the deficit. We developed an expansion strategy and we grew."

Schecter explained the strategy that helped USDS triple its enrolment from 450 students 10 years ago to more than 1,300 today.

"The key to being efficient in a Hebrew day school is to broaden your base by creating more preschool classes. Every day a school faces attrition, for educational, social and financial reasons. If your Kindergarten enrolment is 100 youngsters, by Grade 8 it has dropped to 50. But if you start off with 120 pupils, then by Grade 8 you still have 60. That's two full classes of 30 kids.

"You have to have a strong base to grow through the system. That's what we were able to accomplish. Now, for the third year in a row, we have full enrolment in our preschool. We're turning away children!" Schecter said.

COMMUNITY HEBREW ACADEMY OF TORONTO

C.H.A.T. is a co-educational Jewish high school offering excellent Judaic and General Studies programs.

C.H.A.T. students are drawn from a wide range of backgrounds. Some are from public schools, and we provide them with a specially designed curriculum in Hebrew language and Judaica.

C.H.A.T. fosters an atmosphere of enquiry and intellectual stimulation, while providing outlets for the students' emotional and social growth.

C.H.A.T.'s extra-curricular activities motivate students to acquire the participatory and leadership skills necessary to become vital members of the Jewish community.

C.H.A.T. promotes a spirit of K'lal Yisrael, loyalty to the Jewish heritage and to the Jewish people.

C.H.A.T. graduates - more than 98% of them - go on to post-secondary education. Many attend yeshivot and universities in Israel.

Yiddish classes on the rise

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

Ana Berman's Grade 3 class is preparing for Yom Bialik. The children practise the songs and speeches they will present at a school-wide assembly honoring Bialik Hebrew Day School's namesake. It's a routine rehearsal except for one thing: the 8 year olds are doing it all in Yiddish.

Berman has been teaching Yiddish at Bialik for 13 years. In that time, every one of the school's students has passed through her classroom, beginning in Grade 3 and continuing to Grade 5, after which another teacher takes over until Grade 8 and graduation. For now, she instructs over 300 children in the language of her parents' prewar Polish home.

"It's part of our Jewish culture," says Berman simply. Teaching Yiddish, her mother tongue, "is very important to me and I believe very strongly in it."

Bialik is the only Jewish school in Toronto to include Yiddish in its regular curriculum. Schools like Associated Hebrew Day Schools, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and Eitz Chaim Schools no longer offer Yiddish because of the lack of interested students.

"Students aren't opting for it," says Rabbi Marvin Pachino of CHAT, where Yiddish is listed as an elective course. Rabbi Pachino says "considerably less" than the 10 students needed to make up a class sign up each year. CHAT has 600 students in grades 9 to 12.

"We've found that Yiddish does not draw much interest," says Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits, principal of general studies at Eitz Chaim. About 25 boys age 6 to 11 take extracurricular classes run by the schools' Mothers Association. There are 1170 students at all three Eitz Chaim campuses.

"It's a supply and demand situation," says Lee Schechter of the Morris Winchevsky School, an after-hours secular school attended by 50 students. "We feel badly about it but we have to go with the flow."

Yiddish is spoken by only 5,000 of Toronto's 150,000 Jews. But it lives on at yeshivot like Yesodei Hatorah and Bnei Hebrew Tzion of Bobov, where it is the language of instruction for cheder. "It is a traditional matter," explains Rabbi Asher Bornstein of Yesodei Hatorah. "About 95 per cent of our students don't have a Yiddish background, but the younger they are, the faster they pick it up." There are over 500 students picking Yiddish up at Yesodei Hatorah.

The language is being kept alive in other ways, too. Adult education classes, seniors' discussion groups, after-hours instruction for school children and three classes at the University of Toronto are all available to those wanting to renew their acquaintance with the mameloschen (mother tongue).

For children, there are Heritage Language classes co-sponsored by the North York Board of Education and the Committee for Yiddish of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. Committee chair Sylvia Lustgarten says between 45 and 50 students are currently enroled in the free, year-long classes, taught Sunday mornings at Associated Hebrew Day School on Finch Avenue. The children range in age from 4 to 12 and are taught at three levels.

The Committee for Yiddish also helped develop the high school credit course in Yiddish offered at Earl Haig Secondary School in North York. Lustgarten says 30 teens and adults are taking the weekly classes, offered through the school's continuing education program, at the grades 10, 11 and OAC (Ontario Academic Credit) levels. These classes emphasize written Yiddish and are free.

For those adults who prefer a less structured approach to Yiddish, there are eight weekly Yiddish conversation classes in North York. The groups meet in synagogues like Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, Beth David or Temple Sinai and cost $37.50 for seven weeks. Another conversation class is held downtown at the Jewish Community Centre on Wednesday evenings. This Toronto Board of Education sponsored class has 18 students, each of whom pays $5 for a two-hour session.

BJE keeps costs down, service, efficiency up

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

In these times of fiscal restraint, the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) is working harder and smarter.

Members of the board's strategic planning committee looking at a reorganization of the agency, recognized that lean times lay ahead at a January 1991 meeting. "They came to the conclusion that serious consideration could not be given to any significant expansion and that there would be greater demands on staff," said Rabbi Irwin Witty, the board's executive director.

The reorganization has resulted in a more limited budget and a smaller staff serving the 61 day and supplementary schools at some 70 locations.

Rabbi Witty said the committee found that lay involvement in many areas was limited and they set out to remedy what was perceived to be a situation in need of change. "As a result, the number of members of the BJE was increased, a number of board positions were rotated, an educational service committee with representation from many segments of the education community was established and co-options were made to a number of restructured board committees."

The BJE offers a variety of supports to the Jewish school system. They include teacher interviewing and referral, programs for teachers and principals, teacher training, coordination of inter-school activities, guidance and counselling services in subsidized schools, and a media and resource centre.

The board aims to heighten the awareness in the Jewish community of the availability, accessibility and affordability of a formal Jewish education for each child. It seeks to sustain a fundamental unity of purpose, while recognizing the diversity of views that exists among its affiliates, and to foster high standards of Jewish schooling. The board is also committed to enhancing and promoting Jewish education in Metropolitan Toronto.

BJE staff has taken a special interest in promoting Jewish continuity at the elementary and high schools.

A consultation service offered by the board to its affiliated schools includes individual class visits, meetings with the class teacher to review the consultant's observations and consider special problems, and reports to the principal and lay leadership. From the time to time the board participates in curriculum development at the invitation of individual schools. "An effort is made to provide institutions with a consultant who is ideologically compatible with the religious and educational philosophy of the school," said Rabbi Witty.

A major function of the BJE is to provide in-service professional development programs for teachers and principals in Jewish schools. These include conferences and seminars on a wide range of subjects, such as methods for teaching the Hebrew language, methods for teaching Judaic subjects, the Holocaust, and Israel.

Senior staff of the BJE is responsible for administering the Toronto Jewish Teachers' Seminary — the Midrasha L'Morim. Rabbi Witty said that in addition to conducting and supervising the year-round teacher training program, the Midrasha provides a summer school for the training of teachers for service in supplementary schools.

Serves staff, students

A Jewish teacher training program at York University that began 13 years ago is conducted in cooperation with the Board of Jewish Education.

The board administers the Meyer W. Gasner Memorial Scholarship Awards as a bursary program that provides financial assistance to students planning to embark upon a career in Jewish education.

Through the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, the BJE provides subsidies and grants to schools in the community. According to Rabbi Witty, the board fulfils a major role as a screening and monitoring agent responsibile for supervising fiscal management at subsidized schools and examining various financial operations of those schools that receive subsidies. BJE staff analyze school budgets, review teacher salaries and establish tuition fee reduction guidelines for subsidized schools.

The board directs and co-ordinates a number of joint projects among its affiliated schools, including local, regional and national Bible contests, the UJA campaign in the schools and the UJA walkathon, an inter-school music festival, Jewish Book Month activities, an inter-school dance festival, a Passover food campaign for needy families and a day school parents association.

The BJE Media Centre has the largest collection of audio-visual materials on Jewish themes in North America.

The BJE's Teacher Centre gives staffs of all affiliated schools the opportunity to develop creative materials for use in classes. "Under the guidance of a part-time director, the centre offers teachers training in the use of art, games and instructional aids, all of it produced by the teachers themselves," said Rabbi Witty.

In the past few years, new supplementary schools have been opened in Metropolitan Toronto and surrounding areas. Conferences for lay people and professionals in the new schools are held under the auspices of BJE. Sessions centre on curriculum, teacher training, hiring practices, educational materials, funding and budgeting.

BJE staff is directly involved in the governance and operations of the Orah School for Jewish children from the Soviet Union, a part-time instructional program.

Through publicity and public relations work, the BJE keeps the community, including immigrants and families recently relocated in Toronto, informed of the opportunities for Jewish education. "The staff of the board is on call to address different parent groups, young couples clubs, sisterhoods, and other organizations about schools and alternative Jewish programs," Rabbi Witty said.

Staff members answer questions about Jewish education, by telephone or by letter. They regularly reply to queries concerning common practices in registration and fees, choices of schools for children, schools and Jewish communities elsewhere in Canada, the United States, Israel and Europe, scholarships and bursaries available to students interested in pursuing advanced Jewish studies, and research data available to graduate students and others writing about Jewish education in Toronto.

The BJE works closely with the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education in their efforts to lobby for government funding of the Jewish day schools.

The board is made up of 36 representatives from day and supplementary schools whose term of office is two years. The membership reflects the various ideological movements within the Jewish school system.

Leah Posluns Theatre School lets kids, adults be expressive

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

What can you or your children have in common with Hollywood heartthrob Keanu Reeves? You too can hone your acting skills at the Leah Posluns Theatre School.

But learning about the theatre is not only for those with their eye on a professional career, says director Rose Dubin, who has been associated with the school since it opened in 1977.

Theatre is the most social of the arts, she says. She believes that through the school, children, teenagers and even adults learn to relate to their peers, develop self-confidence, and gain important life experiences.

Youngsters today are in danger of becoming TV couch potatoes, Dubin worries. While she doesn't consider all television bad, children "don't have to use their imagination. It affects their concentration skills and their ability to think imaginatively, and they are less creative."

People learn to express themselves better, and to organize themselves. "Even an improvisation has a structure to it. They learn that everything has to have a beginning, a middle and an end."

Attending such a school also "helps build a critical audience," Dubin believes. "You look at a play in a different light, with a different perspective. Even if you become a doctor or a social worker, you can still have [an appreciation of] theatre."

Students from age seven to adult can take creative drama classes, where, through theatre games, exercises and improvisation they learn "the scales of acting. You learn to use yourself and your body."

Later, you can take more advanced classes, learning "what works theatrically. You might do the same exercise (as the basic class) but you analyse what is going on."

The theatre school also offers instruction in other areas, such as backstage (lighting, sound, and set design), directing and musical theatre. More advanced classes are available for older students and admission may be by audition.

The teaching staff are professionals in the theatre world. They include such noted personalities as Lewis Baumander, founder and artistic director of Skylight Theatre, actor David Eisner,and writer and actress Judy Silver.

Dubin takes special pride in the Young Company, where students actually put on plays. They have produced a play on racism in the schools, for the Ontario Anti-Racist Secretariat, one for the Ministry of Health on how the media affect the teenage image, and a production of Macbeth, set after a nuclear war.

They have just held auditions for their next Young Company play, Romeo and Juliet. ("Keanu Reeves played Mercutio once when we put it on, so you can see the possibilities!")

A summer program, which will run from July 4 until July 28, will offer beginning classes for children 10 to 13, and an acting techniques program for teenagers, which will include movement, mime, voice and backstage work.

The school's Professionalize Yourself course, which consists of eight sessions, teaches business and professional people "to communicate creatively — to use acting techniques to enhance presentation and communication skills."

The Just for Teachers program designs or implements special projects or workshops for schools. It can offer such options as creative and developmental drama, acting techniques or the teaching of Shakespeare.

The Leah Posluns Theatre School, in cooperation with Seneca College, offers adult education courses which can be taken individually, or for credit as part of the Theatrical Performance Certificate Program.

For more information on the theatre school, call 636-1880, ext. 287 or 298.

Religious study courses spread through Toronto

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

Religious studies for adults have become a priority for many community organizations.

Along with numerous adult courses provided by synagogues and schools, the proliferation of other classes and seminars available in the community provides an opportunity for individuals to expand their knowledge of Bible, history and numerous other challenging areas of study.

The Institute for Jewish Learning of the Jewish Community Centre of Toronto recently released its 1994 course catalogue which lists more than 40 courses. The institute has a diverse faculty from Toronto and all around the world, says director Mark Charendoff. Toronto's largest non-denominational Jewish studies program, the institute's faculty includes academics, university professors, diplomats and rabbis, with a wide range of backgrounds and ideologies.

The opening program, titled, James Dean Meets Cain & Abel, presented by Noam Zion, one of Jerusalem's outstanding educators, was a study of family conflicts, Biblical and modern. The course titles for winter/spring include — Biblical, Talmudic and Responsa literature, Jewish history, comparative religion, traditions, kashrut, current events, parenting, feminism, and a host of others.

Nishma, an international, non-profit Torah study network is dedicated to a thorough and absorbing investigation of Jewish wisdom and law. Its multifaceted activities encourage and facilitate the challenging pursuit of Torah knowledge and understanding. The heart of the entire Nishma network is its resource and research facility at the Toronto Nishma Centre, 358A Wilson Ave., Downsview.

Under the direction of founding director Rabbi Benjamin Hecht, Nishma's programs present the entire spectrum of halachic opinions and are designed to serve the educational needs of people of all backgrounds — from rabbis and advanced yeshivah students to those with limited Jewish education.

Nishma circulates a magazine with quarterly updates, and presents lectures, seminars and panel discussions on a variety of topics including women and Judaism, L.A. Law vs Jewish Law, and abortion. Study guides include subjects such as Jewish Love and Marriage, Revelation at Sinai, and What is a Jew? Nishma encourages people to think and to believe that questioning is a function of clarification — not a denial of faith.

Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, a program of the Canadian Council For Reform Judaism, is a community adult education program headed by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein. Kolel provides an opportunity for men and women to examine the traditional texts together from a modern, egalitarian perspective. Recently, Kolel presented its opening program of the season with a week of study on spirituality and faith, with leading rabbis and a psychotherapist.

Traditional texts; egalitarian approach

The spring sessions, which are open to the community regardless of synagogue affiliation or extent of personal observance, include courses on moral laws and personal ethics, Pirkei Avot, Bereshit, basic Judaism, Women in the Torah, introduction to Jewish prayer and others.

Rabbi Philip Scheim, of the Conservative movement says that the goal of programs presented by Conservative synagogues and by the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Ontario region is to provide some sessions which are a basic introduction for Jews of all ages interested in topics such as kashruth, life cycle and ritual observance.

The winter sessions include major themes in Jewish theology, Israel, tzedakah-gemilut hasadim (acts of kindness), the Holocaust and some study of other religions. These sessions are held at the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, 55 Yeomans Road. Individual synagogues present classes on a number of topics.

Aish HaTorah is well known for its diversified programming which caters to the needs of Jews from all backgrounds. Expanded to four affiliated Learning Centres, each location offers seminars, courses and public lectures that convey the depth, relevance and beauty of our Jewish heritage, says Rabbi Nechemia Coopersmith, programming coordinator for Aish.

Aish's four shuls have created a warm, communal service featuring classes on the weekly portion. The seminars and course topics include: soul and the afterlife, Jewish life cycle, ethics, contemporary issues and others. The textual courses delve into the Torah and Talmudic sources. Aish presents Discovery Seminars, programs for women which range from special one-day seminars to daytime and evening courses, and Aish hosts prominent speakers from around the world.

Every day of the week, Ohr Somayach/Jewish Education Program offers courses in philosophy, Hebrew, Torah, Talmud and many more. From beginning through advanced levels, Ohr Somayach's expanding programs reach out and provide an opportunity to reconnect with Judaism and to learn the beauty of our Jewish practices says Rabbi Avram Rothman, the executive director of Ohr Somayach/JEP.

Open to all members of the Jewish community, Ohr Somayach provides the community with an opportunity to explore Judaism in a warm, friendly and accepting environment. It offers weekly lectures, special events, holiday celebrations, week-end retreats and religious services for beginners. There is a Women's Studies Department and general programs on such diverse topics as evolution, free will, philosophy, Jewish law, marriage and Torah.

Home, school, shul must work together: UCS head

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Home, School and synagogue should work together to educate each child Jewishly says Ziona Rubinsztejn, the new director of education for United Congregational Schools, an afternoon Hebrew school that houses about 430 students at two campuses.

"The ideal Jewish education is best achieved when home, school, synagogue and the total environment act in concert to prepare children to take their place in the world as productive, cultured Jews, aware of commitment to their heritage," she says.

After just a few months in her new position, Rubinsztejn has proven time and time again that this philosophy is much more than words. Holiday workshops have been prepared to include parents and children and the grade seven Mitzvah program has families coming to synagogue on Sunday mornings, going on outings of Jewish interest and learning together.

"For the first time this year, children are being recognized for attending synagogue. On each Shabbat or holiday that they are in shul, they receive a gold sticker. We keep track of the stickers and at the end of the year they are recognized for their shul participation. What we are doing, is trying to make Hebrew a life experience."

Ziona Rubinsztejn

Rubinsztejn is intent on getting children to go to Hebrew school beyond their bar/bat mitzvah year and to this end, she is working on expanding UCS's high school program. The current program allows students to earn a high school credit and exposes them to Hebrew, history and the Jewish community. "I would like to see a flourishing high school, but in order to do this we have to make sure that grade seven is an exciting and positive learning experience. The more we make each child aware how important they are, the more they will want to continue to learn. Give them a love for Judaism and learning and let them know they have a responsibility and that will be translated into a lifestyle."

Learning means a lot of fun to Rubinsztejn, and classes at all levels are peppered with learning games that keep up the students' interests. "We also offer a lot of extracurricular activities such as the choir, which is participating in this year's Zimriah, and a dance program which will prepare participants to take part in the annual Rikudiyah, a dance festival under the auspices of the Jewish Board of Education. The Bible Contest is also an important event each year."

Students with learning difficulties are not forgotten at UCS and the staff is fully qualified and always willing to give remedial help. "All the teachers are dedicated to providing each student with a positive, enriching learning experience."

North American Beth Jacob convention a huge success

Students from Toronto's Beth Jacob High School played host to fellow Beth Jacobites from throughout North America recently. That everyone had a terrific time — as well as a spiritually uplifting one — shows in this happy picture [Top, from left] Tirzah Stefansky, Chani Rothschild, Rochie Yarmush and Rachel Meller. CJN Staff Reporter

So you think you had it tough organizing your Chanukah family party? Well, just talk to Shaindy Sigler and Shoshana Lebovic, grade 12 students at Toronto's Beth Jacob High School.

They recently co-ordinated, planned and carried out the North American convention of Beth Jacob High Schools, held this year at the facility on Lawrence near Bathurst. Over 700 girls from some 36 Beth Jacob schools in such near and far cities as Montreal, Chicago, Los Angeles, New York, Cleveland, Washington, Baltimore, Denver, and Philadelphia, arrived by bus, car and plane for the annual highlight.

Toronto hosts the convention once every five years.

Although each Beth Jacob High School is independent, they are united in the principle of a strong religious-oriented education for young Jewish women. The movement was founded in Poland, in the early part of the century, by Sara Schenirer.

Sigler and Lebovic are quick to point out that they did not carry out their task alone; every girl in the school, from committee heads to the newest grade 9 student, had a role.

"Everyone felt a part of it; everyone worked in harmony," Lebovic said.

Sigler remembers that sometimes she and Lebovic would wander through the school to see what was going on. "It was incredible. In every room something was happening, painting, building, singing."

The school started gearing up just after last Pesach. With the help of faculty advisor Shifra Spiro, meetings were held, plans were made, housing was organized.

"We always had in mind that it should be a worthwhile experience — not just fun," said Lebovic.

Just arranging for housing was a formidable undertaking. Over 400 out-of-towners had to be billeted, as well as the many Toronto students who live too far away to go home for Shabbat.

The program, which ran from Thursday night to Sunday night, included a musical presentation, lectures and discussions, lots of time for socializing, a trip to the Science Centre, and, as a grand finale, a boat cruise on Toronto Harbour.

"We wanted a space large enough for a kumsitz and for dancing, but that at the same time was a closed space, conducive to togetherness and warmth," Lebovic said.

The school itself was decorated with posters and artwork. One of the themes was the blessings said on very special things, such as when seeing a monarch, a waterfall, an exceptionally righteous person, or a brilliant scientist. A figure of Albert Einstein, suitably dressed in a white lab coat, was a popular attraction.

Four rooms in the school had exhibits about Israel, its agriculture, history and holy places, and the Torah. Computer games and models helped make the displays more meaningful.

The atmosphere was electric, Sigler and Lebovic agreed. "It was a real feeling of togetherness, a feeling that we are all Beth Jacob, even if we are from different families and different backgrounds. There was a great feeling of unity and pride, when you saw 700 girls all singing the same songs, davening together, and all the smiles."

Rabbi Akiva Stefansky, principal of Beth Jacob High School of Toronto, said that the purpose of these conventions "is to inspire the girls to strive for a stronger commitment and identification with Judaism. They learn the theory, practice and academics (at school) but at convention this turns into an intellectual and emotional involvement with tradition."

This is especially so, he said, for girls from smaller communities, who "get a real sense of belonging."

This convention also featured a series of workshops for principals. "Our lifestyles, our objectives and values, have been the same for thousands of years. But as the environment changes, we have to respond to the pressures of that environment, and give the students the means to feel proud of their heritage."

The principals dealt with ways to inculcate the Beth Jacob ideals, way of life, and emphasis on good character in their schools.

And what did Shaindy Sigler and Shoshana Lebovic get out of their experience?

Lebovic summed it up: "We saw how special every girl is. We learned how much everyone has to offer. There is no one who can't contribute, and sometimes it takes something like convention to bring it out.

"We learned about the inner beauty of each girl. That may sound tacky, but it's true."

Not tacky at all — not tacky at all.

Associated school helps hearing impaired family

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

The bright-eyed seven-year-old is sitting at the front of her classroom for a reason. Rachel Wayne, a Grade 2 student at Associated Hebrew Schools, who participates in Brownies, jazz, baseball and other sports, is hearing impaired. Although a hearing aid brings her level of hearing "close to normal," minor modifications such as preferential seating have optimized her classroom experience.

"She must be able to see my lips [in order to lipread]. It's not quiet in the classroom," explains Karen Brandes, Rachel's English teacher at Associated's Aba and Esther Danilack branch on Leslie Street.

"We've had to make very few accommodations for Rachel," Brandes told The CJN in a recent telephone interview. "She's an extremely bright child. I never have to explain something twice to her. She's so sharp, quick and capable."

Shoshana Gelb, Rachel's Hebrew teacher, agrees with Brandes. "She's a wonderful kid. She picks up on the Hebrew really well, and she's not afraid to ask questions."

One accommodation to Rachel's hearing impairment involves a fellow student who has been asked to remind Rachel to look up when the teacher starts to speak, so that Rachel can give the lesson her full attention.

Rachel, like a number of other students at Associated, requires speech therapy. A private health insurance plan provided by Rachel's father's employer covers the cost.

Although speech therapy is funded through the Ontario Ministry of Health for public school students, coverage does not extend to private schools. A lawsuit launched two years ago by Canadian Jewish Congress, representing a group of day school parents, may change that.

Rachel's parents, Martyn and Andrea, chose to send Rachel to Associated because they felt she would receive a better education there than in a public school, they said during a recent interview at their Thornhill home.

Martyn and Andrea are both deaf, and the school has responded to their needs by providing an interpreter (at their request) for orientation night. As well, they have been allotted an extended time slot for parent-teacher interviews, held without an interpreter.

The Waynes use "total communication," a synthesis of lip reading, sign language and speech. The TTY service offered by Bell Canada enables them to communicate by phone with hearing people.

Martyn, who has a Master's degree in Urban and Regional Planning from Trent University and works for the metropolitan planning department of the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto, is chair of the upcoming National Congress of Jewish Deaf convention being held in Toronto next August. He is a past president of the Toronto Jewish Association of the Deaf (TJAD). Andrea is secretary/treasurer of the TJAD. Toronto's deaf Jewish community numbers about 150.

Martyn would like the hearing community to be more aware of deaf people, he said. Very few services for the deaf exist in the Jewish community, he added. Sign language interpreters for synagogue services and Hebrew school programs for deaf children are needed services, he said, noting that a lot of deaf Jews "give up."

The Waynes have not given up. They attend High Holiday services at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation and would like Rachel and her younger sister Brooke, to have bat mitzvahs.

Martyn's Jewish education took place at Temple Sinai's Sunday school before his bar mitzvah, which was also held at Temple Sinai. He attended public school with his hearing counterparts from the age of 13, and managed without support services such as interpreters and note takers.

Martyn's wife Andrea, a computer programmer, celebrated her bat mitzvah as a university student through the Hillel group at Rochester Institute of Technology.

Deafness is an "invisible handicap," says Martyn. "We can do everything [that hearing people can do], except that we can't hear."

Phonics helps children read, must tailor to child's needs

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Phonics has all but disappreared as a component of reading instruction programs in many Metropolitan Toronto schools over the past twenty-five years, to be replaced by the whole language method of instruction.

According to former public school teacher Karyn Spiesman, "We're seeing the problem now, with children at all grade levels experiencing difficulty with reading." She adds that lack of phonics instruction is responsible for most but not all of the reading problems.

Phonics instruction enables beginning readers to put sounds to letters and then to sound out words. With the whole language method they learn to read through "sight words." A child becomes familiar with new words through constant exposure to them by sight. Memorization, guessing at a word's meaning if the context is understood, and reading cues, such as pictures, all play a part in whole language instruction.

Whole language was never meant to replace phonics instruction, but somewhere along the line phonics was tossed by the wayside, Spiesman said. She advocates using both methods of instruction. "I don't dispute whole language, but I believe phonics has got to be part of the program."

Spiesman teaches initial phonic skills privately to young children through the use of music, creative drama, games and literature.

She said knowledge of phonics allows children to approach new words without fear because it enables them to break down the word. "Kids, particularly at kindergarten level, are very eager to read, and giving them the power that phonics gives them will allow them to forge ahead with more self-confidence than without a phonics background."

Children taught to read only with whole language, she says, have trouble reading out loud because they are unable to pronounce some of the words they recognize.

A program of reading instruction which includes phonics, is more effective with parental involvement, Spiesman contends.

"Reading to your child is the bottom line as far as far as developing reading ability goes," she said. "Children who are read to on a regular basis by teachers and parents become far better readers themselves."

She urges parents to read to their children for as long as the children continue to enjoy it, even if their children know how to read.

Phonics instruction is also used as an education tool in the teaching of the Hebrew language.

Dr. Shoshana Kurtz, who instructs second and third year students at York University's faculty of education in methods of teaching Hebrew, said that since Hebrew is a phonetic language it must be taught with phonics; however, she called teaching phonics on its own "nonsensical" and "meaningless." "We teach the whole word as well as phonics."

She said that if students are to remember what they are taught, meaning must be attached to phonetic sounds.

She'arim Hebrew Day School, a school for children with learning difficulties, is eclectic in its methodologies, which include phonics, according to principal Dori Levine. "We focus in on whatever methods are appropriate, in order to capitalize on the strength of a child as well as remediate the deficiencies."

She said phonics provides one avenue to reach a child's needs, noting that phonics is more adaptable for the teaching of Hebrew than English because of the nature of the Hebrew language. "There is greater one to one correspondence between Hebrew sounds and their written representation."

Phonics is rarely used on its own today to teach English, she said, pointing out that in current educational philosophies, "There's been an attempt to integrate holistic approaches with skills development. Phonics is not really seen as a separate subject."

Levine criticized phonics courses promoted on television, stressing that, as a teaching tool, phonics instruction is inadequate on its own.

Sandy Rabinowitz, general studies principal of the Hurwich branch of the Associated Hebrew Day Schools, said the school uses an integrated approach to teaching the reading of English — a combination of whole language and phonics. He says some children rely more on sight vocabulary when they are learning to read, whereas others rely more on phonics.

By the higher grades phonics becomes part and parcel of the spelling program. "One hopes by the end of Grade 2 children are going to be reading relatively fluently and have the phonic skills to decode words," said Rabinowitz.

Children attending the Associated Hebrew Day Schools learn to read Hebrew phonetically by the first four months of the first grade, with comprehension coming later, said Rabbi Abraham Soffer, the school's educational director.

Rabbi Yitzchak Kerzner makes a point at a Kollel Chanukah program held at Clanton Park Synagogue.

Kollel offers Torah study for all levels

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Serious Torah study, from the most basic to the most advanced levels, is the hallmark of Kollel Avreichim of Toronto.

The small 15-year-old building on Coldstream Ave. in the Bathurst-Lawrence area of North York is bursting to the rafters with classes, programs, lectures, and people studying.

The heart of the kollel is its 20 full-time and 5 or 6 part-time members. These young men are following in the European tradition of supporting talented, newly married scholars, who spend all their time studying and teaching. They receive housing and a stipend, in exchange for which they are expected to maintain their own high standards of Torah and Talmud study, and impart it to others.

But their activities are only a small part of the mind-boggling array of programs at Kollel Avreichim, explained Rabbi Nathan Hofman, dean of students.

A group of senior citizens comes every day, to daven, eat, socialize and listen to a shiur.

Three times a year, a week-long seminar, Yarchei Kallah, is held. Men usually involved in business or the professions come to study and hear lectures on selected themes.

On any evening, Rabbi Hofman said, at least three shiurim are going on at any time. Besides those the kollel itself decides to give, people can call and ask for a topic, or for someone to study with.

"The students by no means are all either experienced scholars or even religious. Many just want the basics."

Rabbi Hofman emphasized that the kollel is neutral. "Programs like JEP (Ohr Somayach/JEP) do outreach, trying to bring people to be observant. We are just out to teach Torah."

He noted that the kollel attracts many who belong to Conservative or Reform synagogues. "They don't necessarily want to become religious — they just want to study."

A service that the kollel considers of prime importance is their "Halachah Hotline." People can (and do) call in with questions on any aspect of Jewish religious law, and are answered by a competent religious authority.

"The questions can be on very difficult matters, like family problems or monetary matters. We even form a Bais Din (rabbinical court) if necessary."

Dean Rabbi Shlomo Miller is considered a world-renowned posek (one capable of rendering halachic decisions), and he is consulted by people from many countries.

A Sunday morning shiur on the teaching of Maimonides, the Rambam, has been very popular. Originally begun by Rabbi Moshe Rivlin, the class is now given by Kollel dean Rabbi Jacob Hirschman.

The kollel is nothing if not responsive. When boys home from yeshiva began to come around, Rabbi Hofman said, they started a program for them, including guest lectures and prizes for those who learned the most.

Other programs include a weekly lecture on mussar (ethical principles of Judaism), an extensive tape and book library, special lectures and classes for women, and Shabbos and holy day services. Students from Jewish educational institutions, such as Or Chaim, Associated, Eitz Chaim, Netivot and Beth Tzedec come for extra help, Rabbi Hofman said.

Kollel staff are involved in bringing Torah to such far-distant places as Copenhagen, the former Soviet Union, and Chili, and in founding a kollel in Edmonton, Alberta.

"The Kollel is open seven days a week. Someone is here from 6:30 in the morning until after midnight."

The influence of the kollel has touched other Toronto institutions. People associated with Kollel Avreichim have helped establish Zichron Shneur, Minyan Avreichim and Agudah South congregations, a shaatnes-testing lab, and Nachlas Tzvi school, and are involved with kashruth and other educational facilities.

BJE hopes for provincial aid

year. This left a shortfall of $2.3 million.

In the face of this lessened aid from the Federation, combined with other factors, some schools dipped into their reserves, while others increased their tuition fees by about three per cent, according to Michael Shoub, the Board's director of finances.

In this serious fiscal situation, the Board is "banking a great deal," Rabbi Witty says, on a favorable judgment from the Ontario Court of Appeal on its request for financial help from the Ontario government in meeting the costs of the English portion of its curriculum.

The submission to the Appeals Court is joined by the Ontario Association of Christian Schools and the Multi-Faith Coalition and is opposed by the Metro School Board and the Canadian Civil Liberties Association. The judgment is expected soon.

The Board continues to have difficulty in finding enough qualified teachers locally and requires the services of schilichim from Israel.

Up to now, the Ontario Education Ministry has given full co-operation on this matter, acknowledging the special circumstances of the Board's need, Rabbi Witty said. "We hope it will continue."

Despite the financial hardships, the Board has completed its most diversified and successful year of in-service training for new and old teachers and administrative staff. Also it has made substantial progress in a strategic plan, adopted two years ago, requiring a re-organization and re-deployment. "It's trying to do more with less," he said.

THE ACADEMY FOR GIFTED CHILDREN
Is your gifted child challenged, happy and working to maximum potential?
Directors, Barbara Rosenberg and Dennis Reynolds believe that the primary function of education is to find and enhance the abilities of each child in order to maximize his or her potential for success. Gifted children have learning abilities that make them unique and thus require a learning environment specifically designed for their special needs.
We are a private day school complying with the requirements of the Ministry of Education. The directors and Staff are dedicated to ensuring a differential education for each child enrolled in our school.

An honest reply to the question, "Is my child gifted?" is best served by evaluating giftedness through assessments that provide appropriate data on your child's intellectual potential.

Scholarly book analyzes education for women

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

Toronto educator, scholar and author Shoshana Pantel Zolty has brought new understanding to the subject of Jewish education for women. She says the forces that shaped the education of Jewish women throughout the ages have never been adequately described, analyzed and interpreted.

In her recently published book, And All Your Children Shall be Learned: Women and the Study of Torah in Jewish Law and History, Zolty helps dispel many myths. Her book, which was chosen as the main selection of the Jewish Book News for November, is a definitive volume on the subject of the role of Torah study in the lives of Jewish women.

There are three components to her book. The halachic component traces the development of the legal literature pertaining to the instruction of Torah to women and the various issues surrounding it. She adds the historical component where she searched for all sorts of evidence for the existence of education for women over the centuries and across the Jewish world, primarily informal but not entirely.

She also highlights women of the past who attained heights in Torah study or who contributed to Torah education or religious ritual and activity in some manner or other. For example, Zolty discusses the 20th century initiative of Sarah Schenirer, the founder of the Beth Jacob Schools which established and legitimized formal Jewish education for women.

"Today, women have more leisure time with technological advances, longer life spans, advances in child care — they have additional time in which they can devote themselves productively to Torah study," says Zolty, who has been in the field of education for more than 15 years. She is one of the founders of the Zareinu Educational Center for Special Needs Children.

Shoshana Zolty

Born in New York, she came to Canada in 1973 when she married David Zolty, a businessman. She received a Hebrew teacher's license in advanced Hebrew studies and studied psychology, speech pathology and education at Brooklyn College before continuing her studies at York University.

On a sabbatical year in Israel, she studied at the Hebrew University. On her return to Toronto, she completed a masters degree and received a doctorate of education in history and philosophy, with specialization in psychology and special education from the University of Toronto. Zolty is the mother of six children from 2½ to 17 years.

She taught at Eitz Chaim Schools and at She'arim Hebrew Day School and is currently conducting Torah classes for women in Bible, commentaries and Midrash. In the coming year, Zolty will teach at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue and at the newly formed Toronto Women's Institute of Advanced Torah Study.

Despite her overwhelming schedule, over the years Zolty found time to do volunteer work working with families through the Jewish Family & Child Service, at the Agudath Israel Library, the Chevrah Kadisha, and visiting residents at the Baycrest Center for Geriatric Care where she includes her children. She emphasizes that "the best teacher is a role model."

Zolty says, "I could not have accomplished whatever I've done without a large dosage of heavenly assistance, the support of my husband and being fortunate to have bright, wonderful children." She adds that her priority has always been her family and she has always scheduled her work around the needs of her children.

When she was asked whether the curriculum in men's yeshivot and women's yeshivot should ever be perfectly parallel, Zolty says this delicate question requires much discussion. She says Halachah does make a distinction between men and women in regard to study, noting that "Men are obligated to study while women are not. This distinction must have some practical application.

"However, it should not be in a form that limits the motivated women from studying to the extent of her capabilities."

Women today, she says, have a greater voice in shaping their own agenda if they are willing to take the initative and seek out present opportunities that meet their needs.

Zolty hopes her book will educate everyone involved in Jewish life. "I would hope people will gain an appreciation of the importance of Torah study in general. Furthermore, there are insights imbedded on every page which have serious implications for modern Jewish education. Of primary concern is the effect that must follow when we see the achievements of women who have taken study seriously. If anyone reflects upon the achievements of the too unfamiliar women documented in my work with a sense of pride and even a desire to emulate them, my work will have accomplished its purpose.

"I have tried to include every interesting fact I could find concerning the history, Halachah, biographies, scholarship, prayers and communal involvements pertaining to women and Jewish education. I do hope that readers will find as much inspiration in these topics as the author did."

Netivot dream a reality: Thornhill building opens

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

What began as a dream some 10 years ago, has come to fruition with the opening of Netivot HaTorah's very own building.

The school, which has 450 students from junior kindergarten to grade 8, is at 18 Atkinson Avenue in Thornhill.

How did they get lucky enough to have the symbolic number "18"?

"We were arranging our postal services," executive director Allan Steinfeld recalls with a grin, "and they said we could choose whatever address we wanted. So we chose 18."

A large, bright foyer, decorated in peach, greens, pink and yellows, is the introduction to the 50,000 square foot, two-story institution. Large classrooms, a gym with skylights, an art room set in a corner, so it would get the best possible light, and washrooms right in the kindergarten classrooms, are evidence of the skill and understanding architect Ben Schultz brought to the project, Steinfeld says.

Although the school is in full operation, much remains to be done. The science lab and art rooms are still being set up. The beit midrash, kitchen, library and computer rooms still await funding to be completed.

Nevertheless, Steinfeld says, everyone is happy to be in their own building. No longer are students spread out in Temple Sinai, Beth David Bnai Israel Beth Am, and Beth Avraham Yoseph, although kindergarten classes are still being held at Beth David so young children from the south end of the city don't have to travel so far.

"We will keep those classes as long as there are enough students to warrant it," Steinfeld promises.

Another service for those living further south is a shuttle bus, which makes several stops along Bathurst Street from Glencairn Ave.

The new facilities allow the administration an independent hand. They can set their own hours, something they could not do when they shared quarters with afternoon schools. As well, davening is enhanced in the beit midrash, where the students lead and run the service and read from the Torah.

Principal Rabbi Avi Schochet agrees that the move has been beneficial, saying that being all together gives the teachers a feeling of camaraderie, and the students a keen sense of identity and pride. "They can see that they are going to a real school!".

A considerable amount of foresight went into the building, Steinfeld explains. Areas under the stairwells, which are often wasted space, are being utilized as storage and janitorial closets. The wheelchair elevator (the building is accessible to the handicapped) is located where it will still be usable if the school expands, and an area is available for expansion.

The building was built with an energy-efficiency grant from Hydro. An energy-efficient design and such details as low energy lights will add up to considerable savings both monetarily and environmentally.

Netivot is the first school in Canada to use a new blackboard technology developed in Israel. Teachers or students can write on the grey surface with any medium, from chalk to marker to pen.

Steinfeld has special praise for the lay people who worked on the project — building committee co-chairs Jack Weinberg and Jonah Turk, fund raising co-chairs Avrom Silver and Allan Rutman, and school president Moshe Kesten.

Nussbaum retires from USDS

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

When Aaron Nussbaum began his career at United Synagogue Day Schools over thirty years ago, he had to sell the idea of Hebrew day school education to the general public.

"Back then we had to convince the community that day school was not un-Canadian. Today, however, Jews are at home in Canada. They do not worry about becoming part of general society, because they know they're Canadian," says Nussbaum, who recently retired as director of education at USDS.

He adds however, that too many people think of Hebrew day schools as private schools. "That is not the purpose. Day schools should be Jewish public schools and that is why community funding is so important. Those that cannot afford it, should be able to attend. My vision is for a free system and when we no longer have to support Israel, maybe we will be able to channel that money to the fight for the continuance of Judaism in Canada. That is the battleground of the future."

In stressing the importance of a Hebrew education, Nussbaum cited the 1960's work of social scientist Kurt Lewin who said that " 'a child that knows what he is will become a better adjusted member of society.' This still holds true today. A Canadian Jew who is proud of his heritage is a better person, a better Jew and a better Canadian."

He says however that Hebrew school alone will not turn a child into dedicated, proud Jew. "There must be a partnership between home and school. If the home is not sympathetic and does not reinforce what the child learns at school, than the child will not respond adequately in school. There must be a lot of home and school co-operation. My challenge is to see each parent enrolled in some type of Jewish education class. That would be a great model for the children. Jewish studies should be as important as any household routine."

Nussbaum, who now teaches a class at York University and is involved in adult education, says that he would like to see USDS and the Jewish community at large concentrate on adult education. "We have been trying, but, unfortunately, personal routines have not yet been altered for a consistent Jewish education. Ethics of the Fathers says 'set aside a special time for studying.' "

Since 1969, USDS has grown from 114 students in one building, to over 1,300 students spread out over three campuses; and it is innovative in the field of Jewish education. "Then, we were the old type day school with half a day of Hebrew and half a day of what they then called the secular department. This meant that Hebrew was more important and the secular department was second rate.

"Today, however, our approach is to integrate the Hebrew and general studies program. Judaism has to permeate both departments. It is not a dual education, but rather an integrated one, and as a result, the Hebrew department has had to become as appealing in textbook and methods as the general studies program."

He adds that the educational approach in the general studies program is an open one "and we have fostered the same openness in the Hebrew program. There is critical analysis of texts, and questioning and discussion are allowed. It is difficult to overcome the differences between openness and tradition, but these difficulties are overcome by a lot of emotional experience. Shabbat and holiday parties are stressed and prayers are emphasized. We try to give the youngsters a good feeling so that even if they are challenged intellectually, they will still remain traditional Jews."

Handing over the reigns to the new director of education, Solly Kaplinsky, Nussbaum says that he is leaving the school in good hands. "I have no worries. The school is good now and I know it will get better yet."

New school director to keep standards

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

United Synagogue Day School's new director of education is intent on keeping the high standards the school has enjoyed for over 30 years.

Solly Kaplinksi, 45, who came to Canada from Capetown, South Africa in early January, says that he feels privileged to be coming to an excellent, well-established school and wants to "maintain the school's standard of excellence, especially in the Judaic, academic and cultural arenas."

As a graduate and former headmaster of United Herzlia School, a Hebrew day school in Capetown with an enrolment of 1,900 students from kindergarten to grade 12, Kaplinski is a strong proponent of a day school education. "Hebrew day schools are a major socializing agent of Jewish identity. Youngsters coming out of these schools are confident, know who they are and have a good sense of worth, self-esteem and identity. The integrated Jewish and general studies programs at USDS allow students to see the world through a Jewish perspective."

Commending the dedicated lay leaders, he stresses that parents must work along with the school in order to reinforce values. "I see education as a joint enterprise between students and parents, especially in Jewish culture and values. I would like to see the school working closely with parents, as well as reaching out to the community at large."

He says that such activities as family retreats, Shabbatonim and a planned family mission to Israel at the end of the year, all serve to involve families in the school and in their children's education.

Solly Kaplinski

Kaplinski cites Yiddishkeit, menschlichkeit, a love of Israel and a sense of community as the values he would like to see instilled in his students. "I want the students to reach beyond themselves and develop values that allow them to have a sympathetic response to the world. This is done through texts, culture and daily experiences. By going out into the community at large and doing such things as working with the elderly, youngsters are making Judaism more concrete. They are reaching beyond the texts and into the community."

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

The Holocaust Remembrance Committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto is sponsoring a group tour to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Centre in Washington D.C. for March 6-7. The cost of $485 includes the flight aboard a chartered aircraft and one night at the Sheraton City Centre Hotel (double occupancy).

In addition to its permanent exhibition, the museum features two non-permanent exhibits. Varian Fry Rescue Mission documents the story of an American Jew who rescued 1,500 intellectuals and artists from the clutches of the Nazis. In striking visuals and sets, Daniel's Story depicts the experiences of a Jewish boy in Germany as Hitler's Final Solution progressed; the exhibit opens in the kitchen of his home and ends at a concentration camp. A city tour is included for those visiting Washington for the first time. Monday is reserved for viewing the permanent exhibition, which generally requires a minimum of five hours.

Stephen Bloom, a high school history teacher from Markham, went with the committee's previous group to the museum last summer. "The most difficult moment was stepping on to the railway car," he said. "As much as I have studied and taught about the Holocaust, nothing has affected me as much as this experience. I don't have the words to describe it."

Reservations are being taken on a first-come, first-served basis. Deadline for applications is Feb. 10. For further information, call Pnina Spetgang at 635-2883, ext. 144. An orientation meeting is scheduled for Feb. 22 at 7:30 p.m.on the 4th floor of the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St.

Dial 1-800-VERMONT for information on skiing and other holidays in the hilly, snow-covered New England state. "As travel decisions continue to be made more spontaneously, having such an easy number to remember will help travellers access the information they need much faster," says Vermont tourism commissioner Bobbe Maynes. A 24-hour fax-back service is also available. Call 1-800-833-9756 on a regular phone, then select the information you want. It will be quickly faxed to you.

Remember Lawrence, Kansas? The quaint middle-American town was the locale of The Day After, the 1980s TV movie about life after a nuclear apocalypse. An important outpost of the historic Oregon and Sante Fe trails, Lawrence boasts a vibrant shopping district, the only brewery in Kansas, and — according to a Rand McNally almanac — the most culture per capita of any U.S. city under 100,000 population. Lawrence's active tourist board says it is a great place to stay for a few days while touring the state.

Golfers should enjoy Myrtle Beach, South Carolina, home to about 80 championship courses. Holes on some courses are set beside huge bluffs overlooking the Atlantic. Others stand beside towering Carolina pines and giant live oaks draped in Spanish moss. High season is spring and autumn, but golfers tee off year-round. For a brochure listing courses, phone the Myrtle Beach area chamber of commerce at 1-800-356-3016, ext. 101.

Last week's devastating earthquake in Los Angeles, which measured 6.6 on the Richter scale, was a mere tremor compared to the 8.3 quake that ripped apart San Francisco, killing 700 people in 1906. Elderly survivors of that quake and the ensuing fire intend to participate in an annual memorial service on Market Street in the early hours of April 18. As the tradition demands, many will stay at the Sheraton Palace Hotel, a city landmark that was destroyed and rebuilt. Famed tenor Enrico Caruso was at the Palace when the devastation struck and ran outside wearing only a towel. "I will never set foot in San Francisco again," he vowed.

Built in 1875, the original Palace was a 775-room luxury hotel that occupied a full city block. It was the first grand hotel west of the Mississippi and the first building on the West Coast with elevators. Since its two-feet-thick walls were reinforced with iron, it survived the earthquake. However, like much else in town, it was destroyed in the fire.

The New York architects who rebuilt it retained the European flavor but transformed the open courtyard where guests' carriages were received into the Garden Court, an extravagant ballroom that was designated a city landmark in 1969.

Three years ago, a $150-million restoration returned the Garden Court to its 1909 elegance. The huge chandeliers (each worth $50,000) were cleaned, the marble Ionic columns scrubbed, the leaded glass in the domed ceiling repaired and polished.

Considered the most spectacular lobby in San Francisco, the room evokes the days of Cesar Ritz, the legendary hotelier of 19th-century Europe whose various Palm Courts and Garden Courts were designed with fine staircases where women could make dramatic entrances and exits. It was Ritz who first convinced London high society that dining out was fashionable, inspired the adjective "ritzy", and named Melba Toast, Peach Melba and Grand Marnier. He also lent his name to the swanky Ritz hotels of Paris and London, the deluxe Ritz-Carlton chain, and probably Ritz crackers as well.

Israel's made for hiking

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Israel may be small, but it's blessed with an amazing variety of terrain, from dense woodlands in the Galilee to sparse desert in the Negev.

For a hiker, then, Israel is the place to be. And no one knows that better than Joel Roskin, an American who's lived in Israel since 1979.

A confirmed nature lover, Roskin has explored Israel like few others, and his book, A Guide to Hiking in Israel (The Jerusalem Post, no price listed), is most informative.

Perhaps the only book of its kind in English, this handy guide opens the door to 40 one-day hikes on the Golan Heights (annexed by Israel in 1981), the Galilee, the Carmel, Judea, the Judean Desert and the Eilat mountains.

Relevant information pertaining to geography, climate, vegetation, wildlife and water are listed in each chapter.

Warm climate

And Roskin describes each of his hiking trips down to the last detail.

Since there is no drinking water along most routes, he strongly suggests that you bring your own supply.

As well, he recommends frequent rest stops, given Israel's warm climate.

As some of the routes pass close to live marked minefields, he warns a reader to exercise caution.

And in winter, beware of flash floods in desert areas.

If you follow his advice, and his suggested routes, you should have a grand time exploring Israel's beautiful vistas.

Sports in Israel

HAIFA, Israel — Israel offers a wide range of sports and outdoor activities all year round.

On the Mediterranean and Red Sea coasts you can windsurf, sail, scuba dive, snorkel or water ski. The Sea of Galilee is a favorite for those who prefer kayaking or rafting down the Jordan River in an inner tube.

Israel was made for the adventure tourist. One can rappel (rock climb) at Metzoke Dragot near Jericho or at Ramot Holiday Village in the Golan Heights. A special program, combining hiking tours and rappelling, is conducted in both of these sites. A day-long rappel course can also be enjoyed at Anatot, on the edge of the Judean desert close to Jerusalem.

Adventure tourists to Israel can now experience parachuting courtesy of the new Sky Club at Habonim Beach, located midway between Netanya and Haifa. The first-ever Israeli venture is expected to attract foreign sky divers seeking a convenient site that is not covered with snow in the winter.

Approximately $1 million (U.S.) is going to be invested to build a state-of-the-art lodge to service parachutists. Plans for the site include a restaurant, coffee shop, swimming pool as well as tennis facilities.

Diving in Israel is truly paradise. Israel's mild climate ensures year-round diving in the crystal-clear waters of the Gulf of Eilat. Try grotto and cave diving, archeological diving, or just diving to see the coral reefs and fish. Spring and autumn diving is possible in the Mediterranean Sea.

One way to tour the country without the hustle and bustle is by gliding through the air. There are a number of handgliding take-off points throughout the country: Mahanayim near Rosh Pinna in northern Galilee; Megiddo near Afula in the Yizre'el Valley; En Shemer near Hadera on the coastal plain; and Sede Teman in the Negev near Beersheva.

For more information on active holidays in Israel, contact the Israel Government Tourist Office at (416) 964-3784.

Bonaire's just great for diving

By MARC HUBER
Special to The CJN

BONAIRE — When Arubans and Curacaons need to relax with a quick getaway, they go to Bonaire.

Just 30 miles east of Curacao, Bonaire is a sleepy Dutch dependency with only 11,000 residents. The tiny Caribbean island has a number of natural attractions, among them bird watching and excellent diving sites.

Bonaire is home to one of only four pink flamingo colonies in the world. Over 15,000 living yard ornaments annually mate in the 135-acre sanctuary. In the 25 years since the Antilles International Salt Co. donated one of its saltwater harvesting ponds to protect the colony, the number of flamingos has grown almost tenfold.

Flamingos turn pink because they feed on pink microlobsters living in the salt ponds. The oldest birds are the pinkest. Visitors can watch them through binoculars at the lagoon's edge or from an observatory built last September for Bonaire's first Birdwatching Olympics. There are more than 150 bird species living on the island.

But diving is the real draw. Since 1979, Bonaire has been ringed by a national marine park. Fishing is restricted and spearfishing, speargunning and coral collecting are banned. Nothing dead or alive can be removed from the water. Anchoring is permitted only at 70 moorings to prevent coral damage.

Last year, Bonaire was the first country in the world to introduce an annual $10 diving fee. In the park, divers must wear a plastic tag. Revenues will be used to protect the coral reefs and improve dive conditions. Moorings are regularly repaired and on-shore markers designate dive spots and their easiest points of entry and exit.

Though the underwater life doesn't match the technicolor wonders of Eilat, the best part about diving in Bonaire is the proximity. Coral reefs ring the island. Divers only have to take a 15- or 30-minute boat ride to the dive spots. Shallow coral reefs border almost every hotel's beachfront, so snorkellers can have a field day in the calm water.

Bonaire is one of two other Caribbean locations hosting the Nikon Shootout, an underwater photography competition organized by Skin Diver magazine. The clear, warm water is rich in sea life and photo opportunities.

Unlike other vacation destinations, there is an unofficial moratorium on hotel construction in Bonaire. New developments are being postponed or cancelled to prevent overexpansion.

Instead, the island's 12 low-rise hotels are being encouraged by the Tourist Board to improve their facilities. Many rooms at the Divi Flamingo Beach Resort lack modern amenities like televisions and phones. The Flamingo does, however, have an excellent kitchen and a small casino.

Harbour Village is Bonaire's fanciest hotel. Rooms including terry cloth robes and a daily, faxed synopsis of the New York Times. In addition to the swimming pool and tennis courts, guests can embark on a short twilight sail to a deserted island for candlelight dining.

Excellent accommodations are also found at the Sand Dollar Condominiums. This resort operates the island's best childrens' program and all rooms have fully-equipped kitchens to cut down on costs. A wide selection of packaged, kosher food is sold in Bonaire's modern supermarket.

If you go:

- ALM has daily flights out of Miami to Bonaire.
- US currency is used widely. There are 1.77 guilders to the dollar.
- There is a $10 departure tax per person.
- Canadian citizens only need a birth certificate and a return ticket to enter the country.
- English is widely spoken.
- The island's desalinated sea water is safe to drink. Special immunizations are not necessary.

Teenage years a time of emotional changes

By MARA KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — Do endless hours in the bathroom, non-stop music, confusing mood swings, declarations of independence and requests to be tucked in at night sound familiar? This is a definition of a typical pre-teen between 12 and 14, according to Dr. Sandra Fisman, associate professor in psychiatry, pediatrics and family medicine at the University of Western Ontario.

Fisman spoke at a Jewish Community Centre lecture series Jan. 13.

Fisman used recorded songs to help illustrate the strong emotions felt by teenagers throughout adolescence, which lasts from 9 to 21 years of age. Pre-adolescence (9-11) is a period of inquisitiveness. Fisman said there is a security of childhood that Neil Young illustrates when he sings "you can't be 20 on sugar mountain," implying that innocence belongs to children.

Puberty (12-14) is the stage when body weight doubles, and height increases at least 25 per cent. There is a disproportionate growth between the body and limbs. It is usual to see big hands and feet with a short torso. Moods are confused, and teens are easily disappointed at this stage. One participant whispered, "I see that in my 7 year old."

By mid-adolescence (14-17), The Who's statement "...hope I die before I get old . . ." makes a lot of sense. Calls for independence, separateness and challenges contribute to energy-filled discussions. Hero-worship and intense crushes become common.

In late adolescence (17-21), youth are ready to take on the real world and seem closer to choosing a realistic career. All of a sudden, teens have incorporated parents' opinions but call them their own. The most important result of the adolescent process is that a new identity has been formed.

Of course there is much ambivalence in leaving parents. In Cat Stevens' Father and Son, Father sings ". . . there's so much you have to know . . . I was once like you are now . . ." The son replies ". . . how can I explain . . . I have to go away."

"As parents, we hope our teenagers will settle down, think about insurance and RRSPs. Ideally we hope they marry," Fisman said.

Parents face numerous issues

Fisman also noted children are not the only ones changing. "We ourselves are changing, declining in strength, changing in our attractiveness. Our children think they have a lot of time to make life choices. At middle-age and up, we see that there isn't all the time for us. Commonly the mid-life crisis happens here.

"As parents, we may also be addressing the issues of our elderly parents. All these factors can challenge the integrity of our marriages. Studies have shown that marital intimacy is at a low during one's children's adolescence." But with an optimistic spring, Fisman quoted a colleague. "Crisis should be an opportunity for creative solutions, a chance for growth."

As a child grows there is parental mourning. One realizes that family life will change and this is a life cycle phase. Younger children (lovingly known as pests) also feel a loss as older siblings moving away.

One of the ways Fisman said adolescents look at themselves is through a peer group. "The peer group acts as a collective ego, teaching boy/girl roles, risks and dangers." Fisman said it is a relatively safe method of checking out oneself, but a negative peer group can accept and endorse illegal and immoral behaviour like substance abuse and violence.

Fisman has advice for parents on how to create a positive relationship with teens. She likened the advice to a recipe for a good loaf of bread. "It takes good ingredients, proper amount of warmth, and the knowledge that there are different types of flour, liquids and shortenings. The raising agent (parents) are very important to the rising of dough (children). They need to have mutual respect and ability to perform conflict resolution," she said.

"Once ingredients are combined with yeast, the dough takes on a life of its own." It takes a lot of kneading, but once the bread is baked, the raising agent is not necessary.

In real terms, Fisman advised communication — even throughout teen door-slamming activity — is still important. Parents need to model specific habits, language and behvior. She also emphasized the importance of supervision in this day of options. "We can't leave the bread to make itself."

Host a Tu b'Shevat seder

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

I have one very vivid memory of Tu b'Shevat from childhood. It was the annual JNF tree drive, and I had saved and saved to buy a tree in memory of my grandmother. I raced home from Sunday school to show the certificate to my parents.

Classic case of good news — bad news. The good news was that they were very proud that I thought of my grandmother. The bad news was I'd have to have the certificate reissued as my very much alive grandmother might take exception to having something dedicated to her memory.

Tu b'Shevat is a "new year's party" for trees. Celebrating the rising of the sap and the anticipation of the first fruits and nuts of the season is a little difficult when it's been below zero for the last few days and the ground is covered with snow. I try, however to get in the mood by singing that old-time favorite, "Here we go with spade and hoe."

I've been asked to host a Tu b'Shevat seder and my first thought was: If I have to clean this house from top to bottom and change my pots and pans and dishes more than once a year I'm going to have a nervous breakdown. I'd never heard of a Tu b'Shevat seder before and I'll admit I was curious.

Attention! This seder does not require massive amounts of housekeeping. A typical modern day Tu b'Shevat seder is based on an ancient Kabbalistic manual called P'ri Eitz Hadar (Fruit of the Goodly Tree), as well as passages from the Talmud and other works relating to fruits, nuts and spring. You should serve at least four different types of wine or fruit juice at the seder and between 15 to 30 different types of fruit (fresh, dried, or canned) and nuts.

BUTTERED RUM PINEAPPLE
½ cup finely chopped macadamia nuts
1 large pineapple
½ cup melted butter or margarine
½ cup honey
¼ cup rum
Non-stick vegetable oil spray
Vanilla ice cream or pareve "ice cream"

Spread nuts on baking sheet and bake at 400 until golden (approx. four to five minutes). Set aside. Set oven to broil. Pare and cut pineapple crosswise into eight one-inch thick slices. Score edges. In a saucepan, over medium heat, stir butter/margarine with the honey and rum. Remove from heat and with a fork dip each piece of pineapple into the mixture. Make sure both sides are coated and then drain off excess. Place pineapple on coated broiler rack and broil slices until lightly browned on each side. When slices are cool enough to handle, coat edges with ground nuts. Place the pineapple slices on serving plates. Top with ice cream. Pour remaining sauce and nuts over the top. Serves 8.

PEACHY POCKETS
2 cups torn Bibb lettuce
2 fresh peaches cut up or 1 can cut up peaches
⅓ cup sliced celery
½ cup kosher honey lemon dressing
3 pitas cut in half

In a medium bowl combine lettuce, peaches and celery. Toss with ½ the dressing. Fill each pita half with ½ cup salad mixture. Serve with remaining dressing. Serves 6 (Dressing: ¼ cup lemon juice, 2 tablespoons honey, combine and mix well).

WHITE GRAPE SPRITZER
5 cups ice cubes
1 can (6 oz.) frozen apple juice concentrate, thawed lemon and lime slices
1 bottle (1.5 litre) kosher sparkling white grape juice, chilled
1 bottle (1 litre) club soda, chilled

In a 4 quart pitcher, combine 1 cup ice cubes, apple juice and lemon and lime slices. Add the sparkling grape juice and club soda. Stir and blend the juices. Place remaining ice cubes in 8 glasses and divide the spritzer evenly between the glasses. Serves 8.

Peres-Arafat talks bring self-rule agreement closer

JERUSALEM (JTA) — Following marathon negotiations in Switzerland, Israel and the PLO have apparently made headway in resolving their differences.

PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, who met with Foreign Minister Shimon Peres in the Swiss ski resort of Davos on Saturday night and Sunday, was upbeat in his comments at a news conference after their talks, saying an agreement for implementing the Palestinian self-rule accord was "very near."

But Peres, who entered the news conference holding hands with Arafat, would not describe the status of the talks. Instead, he spoke of the enormous challenges facing the two sides and of the promise for world peace that an Israeli-PLO agreement would represent.

Sitting beside Arafat, Peres thanked the PLO leader "for his supreme effort to bring our two peoples together in the domain of peace and hope."

Peres said that if the two sides could reach a peaceful settlement of their differences, it would provide hope "that the world can solve all of its biggest problems."

Peres and Arafat got together during a world economic conference held at Davos through the weekend.

The results of these latest talks were more promising than those last week in Cairo, when the Israelis and PLO were unable to iron out their differences over implementation of the accord that was signed in Washington last September.

The Cairo negotiations resulted in a stalemate over several security issues, including who would control border crossings between the Gaza Strip and Egypt, and between the West Bank town of Jericho and Jordan.

Arafat told reporters in Davos that the two sides were "on the way to bypassing all the obstacles which have been placed in the last weeks, to have very soon, very soon, the final agreement to start directly the implementation of the peace agreements."

Neither side provided details of any agreements they reached, but Palestinian officials said a written agreement had been completed and was awaiting approval.

According to Israeli army radio, both sides made compromises, especially the Palestinians, who reportedly made concessions to Israel on the border-crossings issue.

Another issue over which the two sides have been deadlocked — the size of the Jericho area that will fall under Palestinian authority — reportedly remains unresolved.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin reacted cautiously Sunday to Arafat's upbeat comments.

During brief remarks to reporters in Tel Aviv, Rabin noted that past optimism about the course of the negotiations had sometimes proved premature.

Rabin added that oral understandings reached in recent talks often fell into dispute once an effort was made to commit them to writing.

Rabin said he preferred waiting for a complete written agreement before he would provide any definitive comments.

But Egyptian Foreign Minister Amre Moussa, whose country has served as a mediator in the stalled Israeli-PLO negotiations, was as upbeat as Arafat in his assessment of the Davos talks.

The two sides had made "definite progress toward agreement," he said.

Moussa also indicated that Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak had invited Israel and the PLO to come to Cairo for the signing of the implementation agreement.

Moussa said the signing would take place within two weeks.

Canadian rabbis strongly reject Bonds boycott

Some are worried U.S. trend could spread

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — The refusal of a number of American rabbis to hold Israel Bonds drives in their congregations last autumn — a factor in the $10 million drop last year in North American synagogue sales — is worrying some Canadian rabbis.

The boycott of Israel Bonds, initiated by several U.S. rabbis opposed to the Rabin government's peace policy, has not yet hit Canada. But Canadian rabbis attending the annual State of Israel Bonds Rabbinic Cabinet held here recently expressed concern that the protest could spread to Canada.

Some Canadian rabbis said they have already been approached by representatives of the settlement movement, who have urged them to stop raising money for Israel Bonds. The representatives reportedly asked them to channel funds directly into the settlement movement instead.

A number of synagogues in the United States did not hold High Holiday Bonds drives last fall to protest the Labor government's peace plans.

Their boycott was one reason for a $10 million (US) drop in North American synagogue sales, which totalled just under $90 million in 1993, compared to close to $100 million in 1992.

And total Bonds sales in the U.S. dropped to $552 million in 1993 from $651 million the year before.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka, head of the Israel Bonds Rabbinic Cabinet of Canada, told The CJN that the trend has not hit Canada, where overall Bonds sales — and synagogue Bonds sales — were up this year by some $10 million, topping $100 million for the first time.

"So far we have managed to buck this trend in Canada," said Rabbi Bulka of Ottawa's Machzikei Hadas congregation. "But I wouldn't be surprised if it becomes a problem here as well. We are working hard to counter it."

Rabbi Mordechai Zeitz of the Beth Tikvah congregation in Dollard-Des-Ormeaux, Que. said that he and a number of other rabbis at the Rabbinic Cabinet meeting here were approached by representatives of the Israeli right wing and settlement movement.

"They asked us to stop supporting Israel Bonds and to channel our money directly into their causes instead," Rabbi Zeitz told The CJN. He said he rejected calls to undermine support for Israel Bonds.

"The State of Israel Bonds is apolitical. I support it in order to do the right thing for the citizens of Israel."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman of the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda congregation in Downsview, Ont. said that despite his own misgivings about the Rabin government's policy, he would continue to support the purchase of Israel Bonds.

"We shouldn't take economic revenge on Israel by boycotting Bonds," said Rabbi Kelman, noting that Israel Bonds are used to finance housing, immigrant absorption and infrastructure development. "This type of protest would also damage the links between Israel and Diaspora Jews. It is simply destructive," he said.

On the other hand, "a number of [American] rabbis admitted unabashedly that they would not hold Israel Bonds campaigns in their synagogues this year because this was their way of protesting against the Israeli government," said Rabbi Abner Weiss, Israel Bonds national rabbinic chairman in the U.S., during his speech at the opening of the rabbinic cabinet.

Rabbi Weiss of the Beth Jacob congregation in Beverly Hills, Cal., told The CJN he was "deeply concerned that High Holiday sales were down this year," and attributed that directly to the refusal of a number of synagogues to hold traditional High Holiday appeals for political reasons.

He cited congregations in Cleveland and the San Fernando Valley in California in particular.

Some 1,300 synagogues across North America usually take part in the annual High Holiday campaign, which accounts for close to 10 per cent of annual worldwide Israel Bonds sales.

In 1993, overall Bonds sales totalled $1,068 billion (US) down from the 1992 total of $1.17 billion. It was the first time in several years that annual sales did not reach a record high.

Israel Bonds sales are also influenced by the general state of the world economy and by the other investment options available to potential purchasers.

But several rabbis cited clear political reasons for the drop in sales in their own synagogues and in neighboring ones.

Rabbi Marvin Sugarman of North Hollywood, California told The CJN that sales in his synagogue, Shaarey Zedek, dropped by about $120,000 this year, reaching only half of last year's total. "Some members of my congregation even called me a traitor for attempting to sell Israel Bonds this year," Rabbi Sugarman said. "I've heard of Israel Bonds appeals that were cancelled entirely because of the peace initiative," he added.

Rabbi Sugarman said the sharpest drop in Bonds purchases was in Orthodox congregations like his own. "The Orthodox have always been at the forefront of Israel Bonds purchases. But now, our congregants don't want to buy Bonds that may be used to develop Gaza and Jericho for the Palestinians," he said.

Rabbi Weiss publicly lambasted rabbis who have boycotted Bonds.

"Our Jewish brothers and sisters in Israel should not be sacrificed on any idol of any particular political ideology," he declared. "Our commitment is to the Jewish people and to the Jewish state — irrespective of whatever government is in power and whatever policy is in force."

Journal lets teens discuss their Jewish schools

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The sex, drugs and rock 'n roll alone might have been enough to make the student-produced journal Noise a hot commodity among the high school set. But what has turned it into a must-read are the frankly expressed views of teenagers about their Jewish schools.

Noise is sponsored by Shaare Zion Congregation, a large Conservative synagogue on Cote St-Luc Road in Snowdon, and produced by members of its youth group. The fourth issue of the journal was banned at Bialik and Herzliah (St. Laurent) high schools.

Avrum Nadigel, youth group director and Noise publisher, thinks it's because the issue contains unflattering comments on these two schools.

Bialik is described in a piece signed by J. Shraage, a recent graduate, as "a school riddled with fallacy and illusion.

"With the threat of unemployment, they over-emphasize preparation for university. The system was geared towards competitive learning and motivating students who they felt could produce and climb the ladder of accelerated learning," and ignored those who did not.

E. Philip chafes against a perceived strangling of self-realization at Herzliah (St. Laurent). "Administration telling you what to do, having your ideas put aside and your struggle to be an individual being opposed is what high school is all about to me."

A student at the same school is a little more hopeful, if feeling overworked. While fed up with the extra courses and long days, A. Dorfman writes, "I think we'll all realize later in life, if not now, that our stay at 'Hertz' has payed [sic] off."

Nadigel said Herzliah has now relented and allowed Noise to be distributed. At Bialik, principal Estelle Cooperstone told The CJN the prohibition had nothing to do with the content of the journal, but rather a policy against distributing in the school anything other than internal publications or those with which the school is associated, such as the student literary publication Firstfruits.

She said she had looked at Noise only briefly.

Nadigel said other schools that have not banned Noise include nearly all the public and Jewish high schools in the West End, plus the private St. George's, and Cote St. Luc public library. It is free; circulation is about 1,500.

Nadigel is hoping to hold a meeting with the Jewish school principals in the coming weeks to clear the air.

Noise, which is edited by high school students Daniel Hundert and Stephanie Katz, was launched in the fall of 1992. It's one of the main activities of the Shaare Zion youth group, also called Noise, and is intended for any interested teenager.

It's written and edited entirely by local youth, except for a column by the synagogue's Rabbi Lawrence Perlman and a regular feature by Barry Salis, an anti-drug campaigner.

Noise is marketed as an alternative to tamer student newspapers. As the name suggests, it is intended to disturb the peace of adults, although Nadigel, who is 25, said he has not had complaints from parents.

Besides the school critiques, the same issue contains an essay arguing for the legalization of marijuana, another in favor of the launching of a boycott of Nestle products because of its peddling of formula in the Third World, an article entitled Are Men 18 Times More Sexual Than Women? and reviews of school rock bands.

In a piece on what it was like to be a teen during the Depression, an interviewee from the Golden Age Association relates how young people turned to prostitutes because premarital sex was forbidden and how easily children as young as 11 could buy alcohol.

Each issue carries a disclaimer that the views expressed are not necessarily those held by the Noise editorial board or Shaare Zion.

The goal of Noise is to give high school students a chance to voice their opinions in their own way, Nadigel said, something that is not always possible in the sanctioned school newspapers. "Not one adult, including myself, touches [Noise's content]."

Accident claims 24-year-old Becker

'An angelic soul...' Cantor Eli Kirshblum

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —He was just in the wrong place at the wrong time.

What else can one can say about the recent sudden and pointless death of 24-year-old Israel Becker.

Becker was killed when a stolen van crossed the centre line on Finch Avenue near Dufferin Street and smashed head-on into his Honda Civic. Becker was pronounced dead at the scene.

He was returning from visiting his grandmother at Branson Hospital.

Det. Const. Gord Taylor of North Traffic Hit and Run department of Metropolitan Police told The CJN that the driver turned himself in some 13 hours after the crash. The 15-year-old driver, who cannot be named under the Young Offenders' Act, has been charged with criminal negligence causing death, failure to remain at the scene of an accident, and possession of a stolen van.

Drugs or alcohol do not appear to have been a factor, Taylor said.

Becker was educated at Associated Hebrew Schools and at CHAT. He spent two years at Hebrew University in Jerusalem before returning to Toronto and earning a BA at York University. He studied gemology in Santa Monica, Calif., and then, after working for a year, began his master's of international business administration degree at York.

Becker's aunt, Shiny Baine, described him as "the most wonderful young man on the face of the earth. He was gorgeous — inside and outside."

She described how his many friends, some of whom came from Bangkok, Boston, Halifax and Vancouver for the funeral, were bringing pictures to the shiva house, and reminiscing for hours about him.

"The house is packed from 6:45 in the morning until midnight."

Judaism was a very important part of his life, Baine said. He taught bar mitzvah lessons, and read the Torah at several shuls, including Adath Israel and Beth David.

A major interest for him was sports, she said, citing especially a passion for basketball, hockey and baseball.

Cantor Eliezer Kirshblum, cantor of Adath Israel Congregation, co-officiated with Rabbi Irwin Witty at the funeral. He described Becker as "an angelic soul. He was very low key, but there was something about his nature that brought him close to people. The number of young people at the funeral told the story of the impact he had."

Israel Becker

Besides reading from the Torah at Adath Israel, Kirshblum said, Becker was very active in the synagogue youth department.

Rabbi Witty, who knew Becker for several years, said he was particularly impressed by how close he was to his family, especially his mother, and his friends.

The family has set up the Israel Becker Scholarship Fund through the Canadian Friends of Hebrew University.

Becker was predeceased only three years ago by his father, Josef, a Holocaust survivor.

He is survived by his mother, Mary, his grandmother, Molly Baine, his brother Isaac, sister-in-law Chaya and an 11-month-old niece, Yafit, whom Baine said "he adored."

Education conference planned

WINNIPEG — Jewish educators from across the country will be convening in Winnipeg April 16 to 18 for the seventh National Education Conference at the Westin Hotel.

The theme for the conference, co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadian Zionist Federation, The Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education and the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, is Education and Tradition: Building Blocks to a Jewish Future.

Some 300 delegates are expected to attend the conference, held outside of Montreal or Toronto for the first time.

Koffman says goodbye Ottawa, hello Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
and MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondents

OTTAWA — The capital city's loss will be Winnipeg's gain, as Jewish Community Council executive director Gerry Koffman returns to his hometown after five-and-a-half years here.

Koffman becomes the campaign director for the Combined Jewish Appeal in Winnipeg, the position he held before moving east.

Koffman says he began thinking about a move when his father died suddenly last year. None of his siblings live in Winnipeg and his widowed mother was alone there. When Koffman saw an opportunity to go back, he took it.

"We were always raised to take care of each other and I want to get back home to be close to the family, especially now that they are getting old," he says.

During Koffman's years in Ottawa, he guided the Jewish Community Council through a financial restructuring that braced it for the recession and put it on sounder footing for the future.

"The community has grown both in the number of services, the size of the [United Jewish Appeal] campaign and the size of the community, and Gerry took the community through that period," says Bernard Dolansky, current president of the Jewish Community Council.

"He brought a great commitment to Jewish public life," says former president Maureen Molot. "He thrives on working in Jewish communities, he believes passionately in what's possible for Jewish communal life."

Koffman says the challenge of his new position will be to raise both money and Jewish consciousness.

"I'm looking forward to it a great deal," he says.

He will move to Winnipeg in March. His wife Rachelle and his two daughters will follow when the school year ends in June.

Winnipeg communal leaders are anxiously awaiting the native Winnipegger's return.

"He is a class act," said Donald Aronovitch, president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Counil (WJCC). "We couldn't have possibly found a better person for the job. His depth and experience are of great value. He is going to be an outstanding addition to our Jewish civil service."

Koffman was the WJCC's first director of planning and budgeting and previously served as Winnipeg CJA director from 1982-86.

Screening of Spielberg film moves some MPs to tears

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — A private screening of the movie Schindler's List for parliamentarians last week drew about 250 people, including 65 MPs, 12 senators, as well as legislative and embassy staff.

"It started out very jovial with people talking and popcorn going around," said Dan McTeague, Liberal MP from Ontario riding, east of Toronto, who organized the showing. "Within 15 minutes, no one was eating, no one was drinking."

The entire audience stayed seated until the last credit rolled off the screen.

McTeague decided to arrange a screening for MPs after seeing the movie in Toronto during the Christmas break. He said he was deeply moved by the story of the German entrepreneur who saved Jews from death in the concentration camps by employing them in his factory. McTeague said he thought the film's message was an important one for his political colleagues to hear.

"Evil prevails when people who are in a position to do something, stand by . . . and don't do anything," he said.

McTeague said the themes are particularly timely given the rise in racist activity in Western countries and the continued ethnic conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Ticket charge waved

"We're dealing with an international recession, the rise of intolerance in Canada and Germany. We're not immune from this kind of thing happening again."

McTeague arranged the screening by calling MCA Universal in Hollywood, the studio that produced the movie. The studio agreed to a showing at an Ottawa theatre and because of the educational nature of the film, waived the ticket charge. McTeague invited MPs from all three parties to attend.

Before the movie began, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Machzikei Hadas Congregation made a short speech and led the audience in a prayer.

His message, Rabbi Bulka said later, was that evil could only be fought with deeds, not words.

"[Oskar] Schindler was an ordinary guy. If one ordinary person can make a difference, then a group of extraordinary people can make a real change."

Several people filing past him after the movie were in tears, said Rabbi Bulka.

John Finlay, MP for Oxford, was so impressed with the movie he planned to say a few words in the House of Commons thanking McTeague for arranging the showing. He also wanted to mention the importance of the movie's themes and what it had to say about the dark side of human nature.

"There is a veneer [of respectability] on sophisticated society. We don't think we are as barbaric or cruel as we turn out to be under stressful circumstances," he said.

Fairness for Israel demanded by BB

Report delivered

OTTAWA — B'nai Brith Canada is hoping that progress in the Middle East peace process will encourage the United Nations Commission on Human Rights to soften its harsh stance on Israel at its annual session to be held in Geneva next month.

In a brief presented last week to Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs, which meets with non-governmental organizations in advance of the Geneva conference, B'nai Brith said that the UN Commission on Human Rights weakens its credibility as an impartial body when it treats Israel more harshly than countries with far worse records of human rights abuses.

Only two countries hold special places on the agenda of the commission, says Ian Kagedan, director of government relations for B'nai Brith. One is South Africa and the other is Israel.

"This is a signal that these are the worst cases," he says.

At its last session, the UN Commission passed a resolution referring to "Israeli prisons and concentration camps," and another affirming the right of Palestinians "to resist the Israeli occupation by all means," which B'nai Brith interprets as support for violence.

"It's not to say that things are perfect in the territories," says Kagedan. "There has just been this chronic excess [of condemnation]."

In the meantime, other Middle Eastern countries have dodged attention. For instance, says Kagedan, until the 1991 Gulf War, Iraq was not on the Commission's agenda.

"Iraq was gassing the Kurds in 1988 and that didn't merit the scrutiny of the Commission."

The brief also notes that while the Commission has criticized Israeli occupation of the territories and southern Lebanon, it has been silent about Syria's occupation of Lebanon.

"We've contended for a long time that the only reason Israel has its own place on the agenda is not because of human rights violations," says Kagedan. "It's a matter of the politicization of the Commission on Human Rights. The Commission has been used by some countries to smash other countries."

This stance does little to further the peace process in the Middle East, he adds.

"In view of recent positive developments in the region we feel that this year is the year for a strong push on the part of Canada and other states to correct this abuse and bring some reality to the Commission's consideration of human rights problems in the Middle East."

The Canadian government supports B'nai Brith's position that Israel should not hold a special place on the agenda. In past years it has voted against resolutions that single out Israel, said Denis Boulet of the Department of Foreign Affairs.

"We don't believe that the situation of Israel in the occupied territories should be treated differently than other countries," he said.

The second area of concern for B'nai Brith was the growth of extreme right wing nationalism and racism in both western democracies and Eastern Europe. There is support for racist political parties, as well as polls suggesting that a significant number of people accept racist ideas.

"To say that 15 to 20 per cent of a population is openly racist says that our educational effort hasn't succeeded," says Kagedan. . ." We have to show our determination to act against this wave of hate."

B'nai Brith was represented at the meetings at the Department of Foreign Affairs by Kagedan, as well as Paul Marcus, national director of the Institute for International Affairs and David Matas, honorary senior legal council for B'nai Brith.

The six week long session of the UN Commission on Human Rights begins in Geneva on Jan. 31.

Ontario MPP withdraws bill to tackle hatemongers

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario MPP Charles Harnick has withdrawn support from his private member's bill that would have permitted victims of hatemongers to sue their tormentors in civil law actions.

Harnick's decision means Bill 56 will die in the Ontario legislature.

Harnick said he withdrew his sponsorship of the bill after consulting with a number of groups and individuals who pointed out difficulties should it become law.

"A lot of the pitfalls were pointed out to me," the Tory legislator told The CJN.

Harnick said one of the strongest arguments against the bill came from the Roman Catholic Church, which was concerned that such a bill could lead to suits against the church by groups "who saw a lifestyle as being proper and the church not [agreeing with that].

"The last thing I wanted was to pit groups against one another," Harnick said.

The Conservative MPP from Willowdale said he was also impressed by the arguments presented by Canadian Jewish Congress, which opposed passage of the bill.

Charles Harnick

Responding to Harnick's announcement to withdraw the proposed legislation, Congress spokesman Louis Lenkinski said "we were concerned that such a bill might crate the erroneous impression that responsibility for dealing with racist extremists had shifted from the provincial government to private citizens and organizations.

"We remain distressed and disappointed," said Lenkinski, chair of community relations for Congress in Ontario. "Most Ontarians cannot understand why both the police and the attorney general continue to turn a blind eye to purveyors of hate. We hope that the frustration which led Mr. Harnick to propose his bill in the first place will ultimately result in aggressive policing and prosecutions of hatemongers."

Congress has long called on the provincial government to lay charges against hatemongers. Under Canada's Criminal Code, consent of each province's attorney general is required before the anti-hate law can be invoked.

Harnick's bill had proposed the victims could launch a civil action — sue the hatemongers — and receive monetary damages.

"I am not washing my hand of this topic," Harnick said. "I'm totally committed to make the government use the existing legislation to charge those racists."

Congress asks Crown to appeal after Droege acquitted at trial

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Crown is considering an appeal of last week's acquittal of Wolfgang Droege on charges that he violated terms of his bail by speaking about the white supremacist Heritage Front in a radio interview.

Crown attorney Jeff Kehoe said a decision on whether to appeal will likely be made within two weeks.

Canadian Jewish Congress is urging the Crown to take the case to a higher court. "We're disappointed in the decision," said Gerda Frieberg, chair of Congress' Ontario region. "We accept the rule of law but believe the decision must be appealed."

The charge faced by Droege, who heads the Heritage Front, stems from bail conditions imposed by a Justice of the Peace (JP) after he was arrested and charged with aggravated assault and possession of a dangerous weapon following a street brawl with members of an anti-racist group in June.

Bail of $15,000 imposed

In releasing Droege from custody, the JP imposed bail of $15,000 and ordered him not to participate in any Heritage Front activities.

On August 6, Droege gave an interview on a Montreal radio station in which he discussed the Heritage Front, its goals and ideology.

Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Congress, heard the interview and brought it to the attention of police. Droege was subsequently charged.

In acquitting the white supremacist, Provincial Court judge Maurice Charles acknowledged that the radio interview could be considered a Heritage Front activity, but that it was not given with the intent of breaching the peace, Kehoe recounted.

"[Droege] may have been skating on thin ice, but he has not fallen in," the judge stated.

Droege has yet to face two further charges of violating terms of his bail. Those charges stem from two subsequent television interviews he granted to CBC Toronto.

Quebec's Jews, Catholics claim role in agreement between Israel, Vatican

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Local interfaith dialogue participants are taking a small measure of credit for the historic agreement establishing diplomatic ties between the Vatican and Israel.

Quebec, where close to 90 per cent of the population is Roman Catholic according to the 1991 census, has been the site of pioneering Catholic-Jewish dialogue since the 1930s. In recent decades, that contact has grown so comfortable that many interlocutors — although they welcome the new development — think the agreement will have little effect on their relationship because things have been going so well anyway.

Few feel the accord will have much impact on relations between Jewish and Catholic Quebecers in general either.

Montreal dialogue participants feel their representations over the years ultimately helped convince the Vatican to openly recognize Israel. The two are scheduled to exchange ambassadors by the end of April.

"For a great number of years, we have been making presentations to the Papal Nuncio [Vatican ambassador to Ottawa]," said Alan Rose, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) executive vice-president and a dialogue veteran. To his mind, the recognition now means Jews and Catholics can dialogue on equal footing.

"The recognition is the result of many years of dialogue in Montreal and elsewhere. The issue has come up frequently through the years," said Marsha Levy, another longtime lay person in dialogue.

Its importance to Jews here, she thinks, is largely psychological. "It finally legitimizes our relationship."

She thinks the televised image of Vatican and Israeli representatives sitting down and signing a document before the world media may have a far greater impact on attitudes than the many encyclicals that have come down from the Vatican to church leaders.

"We probably already have the best established and structured dialogue in the world," said Father John Walsh, but he understands the importance Jews attach to Vatican recognition.

Walsh, who is attached to the Archdiocese's English-language services office, has been involved in Jewish-Catholic dialogue since he returned from Israel in 1976. He spent a year studying scripture at the Hebrew University.

"Every time I've spoken to a Jewish group, they have asked about the Vatican," he said.

He does not think the agreement-signing will have much "trickle-down" effect to the grassroots. In fact, almost 30 years later, he does not feel the 1962-1965 Vatican II, which led to sweeping reforms of the Catholic Church, including its teachings on Jews, has been felt by the average Catholic.

Sister Diane Willey, who is in charge of interfaith relations at the Canadian Centre for Ecumenism, thinks the accord will give Jews the sense that they are fully recognized as a people and enable dialogue to reach a deeper level.

However, she notes it should be remembered that this is a diplomatic agreement signed between two civil powers and does not necessarily have a direct impact on the communities of the two faiths living here.

Jacques Langlais, a Jesuit priest who reached out to Jews in dialogue as far back as the 1930s, said it should be borne in mind as well that Quebecers are not the church-goers they were 50 years ago, nor does the Church control education any more.

Moreover, the whole issue of dialogue and relations with Jews means little to most Quebecers who have no contact with Jews anyway, said Langlais, a founder of the Intercultural Institute of Montreal. Historically, dialogue has been among "the elites" of the two communities.

The lack of formal recognition has not been a hindrance to pilgrimages or scholarly study in Israel, he added.

"To eliminate the prejudice that comes with mother's milk will still take time."

He suspects most people paid no more attention to the accord-signing than to the other international news they receive daily. "In the short term, the agreement will have little effect, but I'm sure the impact will be great in the long term. It's probably the most important development between the Church and Jews in centuries."

The two major interfaith groups in the city are Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Montreal and Canadian Christian-Jewish Consultation (CCJC), which encompasses the CJC, Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops and Canadian Council of Churches, a Protestant organization. There are no formal bilateral relations as such between Jews and Catholics.

In this city at least, interfaith dialogue has largely taken place between Christian clergy and Jewish lay people, a notable exception being Rabbi Howard Joseph, the current CCJC chair, who is now out of the country.

The Quebec office of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews closed last fall for lack of funds.

Christian-Jewish Dialogue chair David Oliver, an Anglican priest, said, "It's nice to see the national scene [the Vatican and Israel] duplicating what has been happening at the local level for a long time."

The Archdiocese of Montreal has been silent on the agreement, although it did publish the text of the Dec. 30 accord in its official newspaper, with a commentary by the Bishop of Lyon, France.

Vancouver rabbis to deliver lectures in Catholic schools

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Corespondent

VANCOUVER — The recent accord signed by the Vatican and the State of Israel is "a most welcome development," says the head of the local Roman Catholic Church.

"It encourages us to work together to strengthen these ties," said Archbishop Adam Exner of the Archidiocese of Vancouver.

The archbishop was addressing the interfaith committee of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Pacific region. He said relations have always been cordial, and "I renew our diocese's commitment to combat all forms of anti-Semitism, racism and religious intolerance."

Exner said he hopes to sponsor visits by rabbis to Catholic schools as a way of teaching "knowledge and respect for the Jewish faith and the Jewish people."

Rabbi Martin Cohen of Beth Tikvah Synagogue chairs the CJCs interfaith committee. He said relations with the Archbishop have always been good and outreach to Catholics will begin during the annual Holocaust symposiums for students in April. The symposiums will be expanded from two to three days.

Catholic students have always been welcome to attend the symposiums, held at the University of British Columbia. There are about 2,000 students attending Catholic schools in Vancouver.

Rabbi Cohen said the third day of the symposium will be geared to Catholics so they can meet "real, live Jews, since they learn in their schools a great deal about Jews and Judaism but it is based on their gospel stories dealing with ancient Jews."

The rabbi said he has been chagrined about the basic anti-Jewish attitudes nourished through Catholic teachings and said "we will do our best to try and change this." He said the warm relations which exist with the Archbishop will make the task somewhat easier.

Rev. Gregory Smith, vice-chancellor of the archdiocese, told The CJN "we're open to any suggestions Congress makes to help further improve Jewish-Catholic relations."

Adam Exner

Smith said in 1989, 45 priests of the Vancouver archdiocese "shared a dialogue" with rabbis and CJC representatives. The luncheon gathering took place at the Catholic Information Centre and both faiths enjoyed a kosher meal.

Smith said this interfaith event grew out of a conversation between Rabbi Cohen, CJC Pacific region executive director Erwin Nest and the late Archbishop James Carney following a Committee for Racial Justice dinner.

"When the Jewish representatives approached the Archbishop as to the possibility of priests devoting a morning or evening to the study of Catholic-Jewish relations, he gave his warm approval to the idea, and appointed Father Richard Mugford of the Catholic Information Centre as the organizer."

Rabbi Cohen and Rabbi Mordecai Feuerstein of Schara Tzedec both addressed the session. Nest and Naomi Frankenburg, who was national president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO at the time, were special guests, said Father Smith.

Judge denies bail request on drug-related charges

Three held

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Seven charges related to trafficking in narcotics have been laid against Rabbi Meyer Krentzman, who has been executive director of several Jewish organizations and has conducted services at Montreal synagogues.

Among the charges, Rabbi Krentzman is accused of attempting to sell one kilogram of cocaine for $32,500 to an undercover policeman and, in another instance, 30 grams of heroin.

The charges also include possession (including an additional 51 grams of heroin), intention to traffic and conspiracy.

Rabbi Krentzman, 49, is co-accused with Andor Galandauer, 45, parnass of Beth Zion Congregation in Cote St. Luc, who also faces seven charges, and Viswanadham Thamotharampillai. They were arrested Jan. 20 following a search at Quebec Pleating, 5455 de Gaspe St., a company owned by Galandauer.

Rabbi Meyer Krentzman

The drug infractions are alleged to have occurred over the previous two months.

The three men were denied bail by Quebec Court Judge Gaston Labreche and are being held at Parthenais detention centre. A "pro forma" preliminary inquiry is scheduled for Feb. 4.

The three entered not guilty pleas at their arraignment.

A publication ban was imposed on the bail hearings at the request of Rabbi Krentzman's lawyer, Marc Cigana.

In 1991, Rabbi Krentzman led auxiliary High Holiday services at Beth Zion. Originally from the United States, he was executive director for about 10 years of the Jewish Education Council, a constituent agency of Federation CJA that provides pedagogical expertise to Jewish day and supplementary schools.

He was later national director of the Canadian Zionist Federation and director of the Jewish National Fund in Montreal. He served a term as president of the the Board of Jewish Ministers of Greater Montreal in the early '90s.

Police reported also discovering a large quantity of ammunition, including bullets and machine-gun clips, as well as equipment to produce false passports at the de Gaspe address. A subsequent search of Galandauer's home at 5703 Smart Ave., Cote St. Luc turned up more ammunition and a variety of arms, which were seized.

No charges had been laid by the end of last week in connection with the arms or printing equipment.

Jews, Catholics celebrate accord

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Jewish and Catholic dignitaries celebrated last week the recent signing of an accord in which the Vatican, for the first time, recognizes the state of Israel.

About 20 people attended the small and cheerful reception here, including representatives from the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Israeli Embassy.

"We rejoice in the rainbow, the sign of peace, that is manifested in this Accord," said Bishop Jean-Guy Hamelin, president of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, which hosted the event with the participation of the Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel committee. "But we also see the same rainbow manifested in those leaders in the Middle East who are determined to weave a new social fabric more peaceful and more cordial."

Israeli ambassador Itzhak Shelef and the Apostolic Nuncio (the Vatican ambassador to Canada) Archbishop Carlo Curis, appeared together to toast the agreement between their two states.

"We are here exactly 90 years and two days after the first meeting between the Pope, Pius X, and a Jewish leader," said Shelef, referring to a 1904 meeting between the Pope and Theodore Herzl, the leader of the Jewish national movement.

"The meeting was cordial, but unfortunately did not yield any positive results. The agreement which has been signed recently shows how far both of us have come."

Curis did not speak at the reception, but said in an interview that the new relationship between Israel and the Vatican will encourage dialogue and understanding between Jews and Christians.

The accord, signed on Dec. 30 after 17 months of intense negotiations, commits the Vatican and Israel to recognize one another's right to religious freedom in Israel, and pledges them to battle anti-Semitism and racism. The Vatican condemns anti-Semitic attacks, including the desecration of synagogues and Jewish cemeteries, "acts which offend the memory of the victims of the Holocaust."

Israel promises to continue maintaining Christian Holy places and affirms the Church's right to operate Christian institutions in Israel.

Special subcommissions will be established to settle remaining questions about Church's property in Israel, and its legal and tax status. Within four months the two states are expected to have full diplomatic relations, including an exchange of ambassadors.

Alan Rose, executive vice-president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, said in an interview after the reception that he has been urging the Vatican to recognize Israel for 25 years. He says the Vatican may finally have decided to change its stance on Israel because of the world's shifting political climate.

"I think the Catholic Church was looking very marooned," he said. "Everyone was having diplomatic relations with Israel including China and India, Third World countries and the new countries of eastern Europe."

King Hussein agrees to meet with Rabin

Peace prospects boosted

WASHINGTON (JTA) — In a move that could boost the prospects for peace between Israel and Jordan, King Hussein said last week that he is willing to meet publicly with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

The Jordanian monarch told reporters here last Wednesday that he hopes to meet with the Israeli leader "before too long."

"Our people are meeting. We are negotiating. It is only normal that such a meeting would take place before too long," the king said prior to a scheduled meeting with Secretary of State Warren Christopher.

Secret meetings between Hussein and various Israeli leaders are rumored to have taken place several times in the past, including a purported meeting between the king and Rabin last September. However, he has never had an open meeting with any Israeli leader.

The king's comments, which were welcomed by Israeli officials here, came just two days after he held an unprecedented meeting with a group of 30 American Jewish leaders here, a session demonstrating that Jewish-Jordanian relations are beginning to thaw after years of iciness.

During the meeting Monday, he spelled out his vision of a "warm peace" between Israel and Jordan once a treaty is signed, including cooperation in economic, environmental, and other spheres.

Israel and Jordan initialed a draft agreement in September and have instituted three-way economic discussions with the United States.

But the king has been reluctant to jump ahead of other Arab countries currently negotiating with Israel and sign a peace treaty.

Hussein and Christopher agreed to establish a joint commission to enhance consultations and cooperation between the United States and Jordan on political, economic and security issues.

The king had what one Pentagon spokesman described as a "get-acquainted meeting" with William Perry, the deputy defence secretary recently nominated by President Bill Clinton to take over the top job at the Pentagon.

The spokesman said that Hussein and Perry discussed the Middle East peace process, regional security and ways to improve military-to-military relations between the United States and Jordan.

The king also had a private meeting with President Clinton at the White House.

The king's visit to Washington followed a check-up at the Mayo Clinic in Minnesota, where he received a clean bill of health. The king has undergone regular check-ups since a bout with cancer.

The University of Judaism

The premier centre of Higher Jewish Education in America has been severely battered by the earthquake.

But with your help, our wounds can be healed.

The University of Judaism is nationally known for its undergraduate liberal arts school, dedicated to educating the future lay leadership of American Jewish life. Our graduate programs provide the Jewish teachers, principals and communal service professionals of Jewish life. Our rabbinical school helps train Conservative rabbis for congregations nationwide.

But the severe destruction to our campus imperils our ability to provide students the education they expect and deserve:

- Classrooms have been destroyed
- Thousands of books in the library have been damaged
- Dining room, staff and faculty offices and other facilities sustained serious damage
- Broken glass, fallen ceilings, smashed concrete overhangs
- Auditorium closed due to damaged ceiling

Leaders of the new settlement movement Zu Artzeinu (This is Our Land) launched their campaign at a press conference in Jerusalem. [IPPA Photo]

Israeli army cracks down on new settlers movement

JERUSALEM (JTA) — Dozens of Jewish settlers were arrested last week after attempting to establish new settlements in the territories in a bold new protest over the Israeli government's peace initiatives.

Most of those arrested remained in custody for a further 48 hours because they refused to sign a paper saying they would refrain from repeating their activities.

Earlier in the week, leaders of the new group, known as Zu Artzeinu (This Is Our Land), held a news conference where they vowed to establish a new settlement every day, except on Shabbat, until 130 new communities are created.

They said they would attempt to put up the new settlements next to those already in existence. They are calling their endeavor "Operation Duplication."

Joining the settlers at the news conference were the leaders of a new group of immigrants from the former Soviet Union established to protest the government's peace policies.

The leaders included some well-known former Soviet prisoners of Zion: Ida Nudel, Yosef Mendelevich and Yosef Begun.

"We were willing to be arrested for Zion in Russia. We are certainly willing to be arrested for Zion in Israel," they said in a statement.

The group's leaders said each new settlement — which would double the number of existing settlements in the territories — would be named after a Jewish victim of Arab terrorism.

The new movement does not have the blessing of the entire settlement movement, with the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza (YESHA) officially having come out against it.

Last Sunday, 40 Israelis were arrested when they set up a tent in an attempt to establish a settlement about a kilometre north of the community of Karnei Shomron.

Some of the settlers chained themselves together while others sang nationalist songs and waved Israeli flags.

Security forces had to drag several settlers out. A photographer for an Israeli weekly was arrested for taking pictures in a closed military zone.

Last Wednesday and Thursday nights, Israeli security forces forcibly removed settlers from two areas where they had tried to implement their plans.

The group of 50 arrested Wednesday night were trying to establish a settlement near the West Bank town of Kiryat Arba, near Hebron. The settlement was to be named Givat Lapid, after Mordechai and Shalom Lapid, who were killed in a terrorist attack last month. Witnesses said five of Lapid's 13 children were arrested in the raid.

Thirty-five of those detained refused to sign the document that would enable them to be released from jail, even after a Jerusalem magistrate ordered them released on their own recognizance if they refrained from entering any closed military zone.

They also resisted being fingerprinted.

Last Thursday, another group was arrested trying to create a settlement in a windswept valley near Bat Ayin, one of the large group of settlements comprising Gush Etzion, just south of Bethlehem.

Observers said the vigor of the Israel Defence Force action shows that Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has ordered a policy of firmness to prevent any new settlements being established without authorization.

Reporters covering the arrests were physically driven off by soldiers, who declared the entire area closed.

"We have to show the world, and especially this country (and) our own fellow Jews, that we are alive and well, we're excited, we're building, we're growing," Shmuel Sackett, a spokesman for the group, told Israel Radio.

"We're not hiding under our beds, and we're certainly not running away taking some sort of compensation payments," he said.

Members of the group said they would employ passive resistance in the face of evacuation orders.

Rabin backs fundraising

JERUSALEM (JTA) — Following some poorly received remarks on Diaspora fundraising by Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has assured leaders of North American Jewish fundraising organizations of his strong and ongoing support.

"I see great importance in the continuation — even more, the intensification — of fundraising efforts among the Jews of the free world, and in deepening education activities for the strengthening of Jewish identification with Israel," Rabin wrote to the head of the United Israel Appeal, Shoshana Cardin.

Rabin's letters, one to Cardin and the other to Jay Yoskowitz, executive vice-chairman of the UIA, came after Beilin's criticism of Diaspora fundraising.

In several speeches and media appearances, Beilin suggested that Israel's current economic and political strength made the traditional form of United Jewish Appeal-Federation fundraising obsolete.

He recommended the dismantling of the present UJA-to-Jewish Agency funding structure, in which the UIA serves as a middleman. He suggested that the funds raised would be better used to finance Jewish education in the Diaspora [CJN, Jan. 27].

Rabin called Beilin's remarks "idiotic."

In his letters, written last week and made available to JTA, Rabin referred to "recent statements made in Israel about the role of Jewish fundraising campaigns overseas."

"The central role of the state of Israel is to serve as a sanctuary for Jews from distressed communities, as well as to present a challenge for Jews from developed countries who wish to build their homes here," he wrote.

The immigrations from the former Soviet Union, Ethiopia, Yemen and other countries, Rabin wrote, "have placed and are placing before the State of Israel, the Jewish people and the various campaigns one of the greatest Zionist challenges since the state was established.

"I believe that the Jewish organizations in the Diaspora have a very important role to play in strengthening the Jewish and Zionist infrastructure of Jewish communities, and in the building and development of Israeli society.

"The involvement of Diaspora Jewry with Israel, its problems and accomplishments, is the key to reinforcing the relationship between us and deepening the connection of Diaspora Jews with Israel.

"Fundraising should bring with it," Rabin said, "investment in the Israeli economy. It should be conducted as part of a comprehensive educational effort whose purpose is to make Israel the center of Jewish identity and experience."

Anti-Semitic incidents up in the U.S.

NEW YORK (JTA) — The number of anti-Semitic assaults, threats and harassments in the United States reported to the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) rose again last year, continuing an upward trend begun in 1985 that was interrupted only in 1992.

The 1,079 incidents reported in 1993 are more than triple the 306 reported eight years earlier and the most since ADL began tabulating such events in 1980.

But the year also saw the third straight decline in the number of reported incidents of anti-Semitic vandalism and graffiti. They totaled 788, according to the 1993 Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents released by ADL last week.

ADL explains these numbers as reflecting a greater vigilance toward anti-Semitic vandalism by Jews and the police, on the one hand, and a greater willingness by anti-Semites to indulge their hatred in daylight.

"There's been a dramatic increase in what we call 'in-your-face' anti-Semitism," said ADL National Director Abraham Foxman.

"This is more frightening, more confrontational, more devastating, and in terms of the trauma to the individual, the family and the community affected, much more significant than a swastika on the building," he said.

At the same time, the 1,079 reported anti-Semitic assaults and harassments, none of which involved fatality, is roughly the same as the number of American Jews killed in car accidents, assuming traffic fatalities are distributed evenly along religious and ethnic lines.

Nonetheless, Foxman believes the audit, which he calls the most significant barometer of anti-Semitism in the U.S., has an important message.

"I remember when we first came out with the report and somebody said, 'Big deal, in a country of 200 million people, there are 200 incidents,'" said Foxman.

"Tell that to the people affected," he added. "What would be horrendous? How do you quantify it? I don't think there's a rampant epidemic, but it's there, in sufficient numbers to be troublesome and disconcerting.

"The fact it continues to rise is also a troubling element," he said.

It is unclear whether the increase reflects increased hatred or merely more thorough reporting of anti-Semitic attacks.

"We think it's a constant," said Foxman. "It's the same coefficient of non-reporting."

He believes that what is at play is an increasing tolerance of hatred in American society.

A similar explanation for the apparent contradiction between declining attitudes of anti-Semitism and the increasing number of anti-Semitic acts was offered by Jerome Chanes, co-director for domestic concerns of the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council.

"Among those relatively few people who hold anti-Semitic attitudes or views or beliefs, there's been a greater propensity in recent years to act out their beliefs," said Chanes. He said this reflects a general "greater propensity for people to act out their beliefs."

How people are acting out those beliefs, as reflected in the ADL survey, runs the gamut from a brick thrown through a window displaying a family's Chanukah decorations in Billings, Mont., to a man yelling "Jew" at a mourner leaving a cemetery in Framingham, Mass.; from an anti-Semitic letter sent to a newly elected Denver City Council member to 25 cemetery desecrations, eight of them in Ohio.

The variety of incidents adds to the uncertainty surrounding the number: When hundreds of swastikas were painted on institutions and buildings in Washington, D.C. over two days, and when hundreds of anti-Semitic leaflets were delivered to Jews in Teaneck, N.J., each was counted as only one incident.

Still, certain trends seem clear.

The good news is that while neo-Nazi skinheads were proven responsible for a dozen incidents in eight states, that represents a substantial decline from five years ago.

"They've become more of a target for law enforcement," said Foxman. He pointed out that eight of them were arrested for plotting to blow up a black church and assassinate black and Jewish leaders in Southern California.

Most of the skinheads' criminal activity, according to ADL, was committed against black, Hispanic and gay targets, or against other rival skinhead groups.

But a clearly worrisome trend was the continued increase in incidents reported on campus. There were 122 such incidents reported on 81 campuses, up from 114 on 60 campuses last year and more than double the 1988 figures.

These include high-profile anti-Semitism in the guise of academic discussion, such as speeches by Nation of Islam official Khalid Abdul Muhammad and advertisements placed in college newspapers by Holocaust denier Bradley Smith, as well as violent acts such as a brick thrown through the front window of the Hillel building at Michigan State University.

Also reported were dozens of swastikas scrawled in campus lavatories, in elevators and on bulletin boards.

For the third year in a row, the number of incidents of vandalism against public property outnumbered those against synagogues and other Jewish institutions by more than two to one.

Interestingly, the volume of anti-Semitic vandalism — the most public and most widely reported sort of incident — has tracked a course over the 13 years that ADL has been issuing its audit rather similar to that of hard economic times.

The fewest reported incidents came in 1986, at the peak of the Reagan-era economic boom. It rose again starting in 1987, the year of the stock market crash, and peaked in 1990 at the height of the economic recession.

In general, "there is a correlation: When the economy is down, there is greater crime. When there are more jobs, there is less time," said Gerald Arenberg, executive director of the National Association of Chiefs of Police in Washington.

Foxman said that while historically the linkage between economic troubles and anti-Semitism is clear, "I'm not sure it's susceptible to such precise fluctuations. These were dips and recessions. I'll leave that to the sociologists."

The increased attention being paid to security by the Jewish community and the increasing chance of prosecution for vandals "probably accounts for the downturn more than anything else," he said.

And while two-thirds of the states now have laws increasing the penalties for hate crimes, "it's too early to correlate the impact," said Foxman. He observed that many of the incidents are not in themselves crimes.

Not surprisingly, reported incidents were highest in the states with the most Jews: 273 in New York, 234 in New Jersey, 195 in Florida, 191 in California and 189 in Massachusetts.

Nevada, North Carolina and Arkansas had no reported anti-Semitic incidents.

WATER, WATER EVERYWHERE ...

Recent immigrants from Ethiopia are seen working in the front of the new natural waterfall. The popular Nahal David river walk in Ein Gedi National Park is now open to visitors with a new look. Flash floods washed away much of the dense vegetation and created new waterfalls and streams. [Israel photo]

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

MOTENKO — LAZARESCU

Motenko is the surname of a brilliant modern language scholar in Toronto, who went on to become a professor in the United States.

Its origin is from Mordechai, the hero of the festival of Purim, which has spawned a host of variants, including Mordushenko.

The "enko" ending of a surname usually denotes a resident of Kiev in the Ukraine.

The "escu" ending as in Lazarescu is of Romanian origin.

SURDIN

When Jules Surdin, the personable past president of Beth Tzedec Congregation, asked me to research his surname, I recalled how my aunt became known as Sardine (although she was built more like a whale) because her Jewish name was Sarah Dinah. However, a little fishing led me to the village of Surdy in the Mogilev region.

CJC Seeks Leave on Ross Case

MONCTON — Canadian Jewish Congress will seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada the New Brunswick Court of Appeal decision that allowed teacher Malcolm Ross's possible return to the classroom. CJC supports the action of the New Brunswick Human Rights Commission, which voted last month to take the matter to the Supreme Court. Ross has authored several books alleging a conspiracy by Jews to take over the world.

VANCOUVER — The British Columbia film classification bureau has approved a videotape featuring British Holocaust revisionist David Irving. Titled Search for Truth, the 85-minute video is about Irving's view that the number of Jews killed in the Holocaust has been greatly exaggerated. The B.C. film classification board says it doesn't censor films.

Probe of Crown Heights Riots

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Justice Department announced last week it would launch a federal investigation into the death of a yeshiva student during the 1991 Crown Heights riots. Attorney General Janet Reno wrote to the Brooklyn District Attorney, stating that the Justice Department was willing to empanel a federal grand jury to probe the death of Yankel Rosenbaum, a chassidic Jew from Melbourne killed in the three days of violence that rocked the Brooklyn neighborhood in August 1991, after a 7-year-old black boy was killed by a car driven by another chassidic Jew. Some in New York's Jewish leadership criticized Reno's probe as too narrow in focus.

Rabin Rebukes General

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last week reprimanded the head of the IDF Planning Branch, Maj.-Gen. Uzi Dayan, for indicating that war might break out in 1994 if the peace talks break down. "I would be more careful than Maj.-Gen. Dayan," Rabin reportedly said. "It was a bad way of putting it." The day before, Dayan, who appeared with Deputy Chief of General Staff Maj.-Gen. Amnon Shahak, told defence correspondents: "We must not forget our basic obligation as the Israel Defence Forces: preparation and preparedness for the possibility of a breakdown in the peace process, which could lead to a limited war, more or less, even in 1994."

Delay in Dinitz Case

JERUSALEM — Another week may pass before Attorney General Michael Ben-Yair decides whether to press criminal charges against Simcha Dinitz, according to a spokeswoman for the Attorney General's Office. Dinitz, who chairs the Jewish Agency for Israel and the World Zionist Organization, has been under investigation for possible fraud, including using agency credit cards for personal expenses. The spokeswoman said she expected a decision would be made in about two weeks. Dinitz has agreed to take a leave of absence if he is indicted. He also agreed to retire by the end of the year if any legal proceedings against him are not concluded by then.

Argentine Rabbi Attacked

BUENOS AIRES — Argentine Jews are experiencing a heightened fear of anti-Semitism in the wake of a violent attack on the country's leading rabbi. Rabbi Salomon Benhamu, 57, was walking to his synagogue in Buenos Aires on Shabbat with his 10-year-old son, when he was assaulted in broad daylight by four people who shouted anti-Semitic slurs and beat him. The attack made headlines in Buenos Aires. Argentine President Carlos Menem telephoned the rabbi and condemned the violence.

Jewish Man Murdered

ALGIERS — A 62-year-old Jewish man was murdered here last week, and leaders of the tiny Jewish community fear he may be the latest victim of a wave of xenophobic killings that has rocked the country. The victim, Raymond Louzoum, was murdered in the optical shop he owned on the largest street of the Algerian capital. No one claimed responsibility for the killing, but Jewish leaders believe it may have been the work of the Islamic Salvation Front, a group of Muslim fundamentalists opposed to the Algerian government. If so, Louzoum would be the first Jewish victim in the wave of killings that has terrorized the country since last September and claimed 26 other lives.

Pope to Israel by 2000

ROME — During the next six years, Pope John Paul II wants to make a pilgrimage to major biblical sites in Israel and elsewhere. "My overall desire in the time left before the year 2000 ... is to walk along the paths of the people of God in the Old Testament, and then naturally arrive in the Holy Land — Nazareth, Bethlehem and above all Jerusalem," the Pope told reporters last week. Israel and the Vatican established diplomatic relations at the end of December. The Israeli government has invited John Paul to visit whenever he wants.

Draft Law Disappoints

PRAGUE — Jewish community leaders in the Czech Republic are protesting recently drafted legislation to return confiscated Jewish property, saying the measures do not go far enough. The draft law calls for the return of all functioning synagogues and all Jewish cemeteries to the country's dwindling Jewish community. But the Federation of Jewish Communities here has charged that there is a substantial amount of property still to be returned to its original Jewish owners. According to the draft legislation, which still has to be approved by Parliament, nonfunctioning synagogues held by churches, nongovernmental organizations and private persons would not be returned to the Jewish community.

Touvier Trial for March 17

PARIS — French wartime collaborator Paul Touvier will go on trial for crimes against humanity on March 17 in the Versailles Court of Justice. Touvier, 79, was the intelligence chief of the collaborationist Vichy regime's militia in Lyon during World War II. He was twice sentenced in absentia to death following the war but managed to avoid arrest for 25 years Touvier was finally arrested in 1989 and jailed until 1991, when he was released because of reported bad health. He will now be tried on only one count: that he picked seven Jewish hostages who were shot on June 29, 1944 in the southeastern town of Rillieux-la-Pape to avenge the Resistance's murder of Philippe Henriot, the Vichy regime's minister of propaganda.

Major Meets Arad's Family

LONDON — The case of missing Israeli airman Ron Arad received a boost last week, when British Prime Minister John Major agreed to meet with members of Arad's family, who were visiting here. In a second encouraging development, British diplomats, including Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd, announced that they had taken up the case of the missing airman with Iranian and Syrian officials. Major's meeting with Arad's family was planned after 800 people demonstrated outside the Iranian Embassy here, calling for the release of Arad, who bailed out from a fighter plane over Lebanon in 1986 and was believed to have been held by pro-Iranian troops in Lebanon.

Jewish ANC Contenders

JOHANNESBURG — Four Jews are among the top 50 names on the African National Congress' slate of candidates for South Africa's first non-racial elections in April. Several other Jews are listed among the ANC's top 200. The ANC, led by Nelson Mandela, is the first political party to announce its list of candidates for the country's Parliament. Joe Slovo, chairman of the South African Communist Party, a longtime ally of the ANC, holds the No. 4 slot in the party list.

FACT: BROKERS HAVE TO BUY FROM A DEALER LIKE PARKWOOD

MORRIS SEIGEL
GM-Grand Salesmaster

Our strategy for 1994 is to be at least equal or better priced than any broker or leasing company.

There is a misconception that so-called brokers can purchase or lease cars for less than an authorized dealer. Nothing can be further from the truth. And, there is far less hassle involved in establishing warranty registration, service, dependability, etc.

Buying or leasing the Parkwood Price is always the Right Price.

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN

Our tradition possesses many wonderful works of moral and ethical wisdom. From the Book of Proverbs in the Bible to the works of Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, Judaism has emphasized the importance of guidance and instruction in the realm of behavior and conduct among people.

Probably the best known of this genre of writing is Pirkei Avot, the Wisdom of the Sages. This little compendium from the Mishnah is unique in that it is made up solely of the dicta of the rabbis of that time concerning proper conduct, as an individual Jew, as a member of the Jewish people and as a human being.

One of the most significant of the sayings in this collection is a brief one. It contains but seven Hebrew words — Al tistakel bakankan ela vameh sheyeh bo. It is rendered in English — Do not look at the container but at its contents. Now one might be inclined to overlook these words. After all, there is an equivalent saying in English — Do not judge a book by its cover — and the wisdom of these words appears to be rather pedestrian. In reality, these two axioms address a common difficulty today, both within our community and in general.

It is conventional wisdom that first impressions count the most. While this may be so, it means that, all too often, we only judge others by externals. First impressions do not allow for familiarity with the kind of character a person possesses, the talents he or she has, or the knowledge they may have accumulated.

Christy Brown was a very talented Irish writer and poet. But he was born with a crippling neurological disease which left his body twisted and his speech barely intelligible. The only part of his body he could move was his left foot, hence the title of his autobiography and the subsequent award-winning film. Through the use of that left foot and some modern technology, Brown's creativity and brilliance was revealed.

Most people would have been taken aback, even repulsed at the sight of Brown. But if they looked beyond his infirmity and physical appearance, if they would look inside the 'container,' they would find great charm and beauty.

This is also a phenomenon in Jewish life. For example, a Jew dressed in chassidic garb with payes and a long beard is, for some, the quintessential external picture of the truly authentic Jew. For others, this appearance represents the portrait of a rabbinical figure. Still, for others, it is a picture which represents hypocrisy and false piety. Yet, all of these judgements are faulty because they are made on the basis of external appearance alone. Such judgements need to be made with different criteria. They are actually determined by a person's character, wisdom, knowledge, and sincerity. Indeed, it is what is inside that counts.

The dictum in Pirkei Avot reminds us that in making assessments of others, it is not sufficient to look at outward appearance and mannerisms only. These provide but a partial picture. The full picture is found by attempting to look into another's soul.

Women lose prayer battle

JERUSALEM (JTA) — Israel's Supreme Court last week rejected a petition by women to conduct prayer services at the Western Wall.

The court turned down the petition of the women, who sought to pray aloud at the Western Wall, while wearing tallisim, in the face of violent opposition by fervently Orthodox groups.

The Women of the Wall, as they have come to be known since they filed the petition in 1989, were joined in their campaign by an organization of women from abroad, the International Committee for the Women at the Kotel.

The Women of the Wall claimed a partial victory.

They pointed to the court's call for the establishment of a government committee to investigate the matter and to find a way to balance the needs and sensitivities of all worshippers at the Wall.

The decision was "extremely positive," said Bonna Haberman, the group's founder. "The Supreme Court has demanded that the state recognize that women's voices, our freedom of access and our right to prayer are included in the mosaic of religious pluralism at the holy site," she said.

Miriam Isserow, the attorney for the Israel Women's Network, however, called the decision "very disappointing" and charged that it "bowed to the demands of the ultra-Orthodox."

Rabbi Yehuda Getz, who oversees religious practices at the Wall, was equivocal as he walked out of the courtroom.

He called the ruling "neither here, nor there," and said he trusted the government committee charged by the court to investigate the matter would use "common sense" in making a final decision.

Rabbi Simha Meron, a lawyer and former director of Israel's rabbinical courts, was among those representing the Orthodox position in the case.

Read from Torah

He expressed confidence that the government committee would "find ways around" the women's claim that they have a right to pray the same way men do, which he said is "not according to halacha."

Until the committee renders its decision, he said, religious activities at the Wall will continue to fall under the authority of the Orthodox rabbinate.

The women's petition was filed five years ago, several months after the group of mostly Orthodox women began to pray together each Rosh Chodesh, or new month, in the women's section of the Wall.

They sang aloud, wore prayer shawls and read from the Torah, in the same fashion as the men on the other side of the low partition dividing the two sections.

According to media reports at the time, each time the women prayed, they were harassed by the fervently Orthodox groups, who claimed the women were violating Jewish law.

They also maintained that because the women were praying with raised voices, they were distracting the men from worship.

Women are permitted and even encouraged to pray at the Wall, they maintained, but they should do so silently.

The hostility culminated in a violent attack on the women in March 1989, when police were called in to disperse the crowds with tear gas.

The women subsequently filed their petition with the Supreme Court, calling for the Religious Affairs Ministry, the chief rabbis, the police and fervently Orthodox political parties to show why the authorities failed to protect them as they exercised their right to pray as they saw fit.

Since then, the group has dwindled to a few dozen, but it has continued to pray each month at the Wall. The group has been subject to a court order, however, barring them from praying with a Torah and with prayer shawls.

Islamic rebellion in Egypt could affect Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Egypt is facing a mounting Islamic fundamentalist rebellion.

The revolt is nothing less than an increasingly violent attempt by Muslim militants to overthrow the pro-Western Egyptian government, led by President Hosni Mubarak, and to establish an Islamic regime patterned after Iran.

On the rampage for the past two years, the insurrectionists have attacked government ministers and high officials, senior army officers, secular intellectuals, Copts (the indigenous Christians of Egypt) and foreign tourists.

With an eye for international headlines, the militants have tried to assassinate such prominent figures as Prime Minister Atef Sedki, Interior Minister Hassan al-Alfi and Gen. Osman Shahin, the commander of Cairo's central military district.

And they have threatened so-called "enemies of Islam." Chief among these are Naguib Mahfouz, the Nobel Prize-winning novelist; Adel Imam, a popular film actor; and Amina el-Saeed, one of Egypt's most illustrious writers.

Xenophobic, fanatical and utterly dedicated, the militants have also imposed something of a reign of terror on Egypt's venerable Copt community — gunning down Christian civilians, burning and looting churches and demolishing Christian-owned shops.

The violence, which has claimed more than 200 lives in and around Cairo and in southern Egypt, has practically ruined Egypt's lucrative tourism industry. The fundamentalists have deliberately targeted the travel industry because it has been one of the pillars of Egypt's moribund economy.

Tourism, which once brought in some $2 billion (US) annually, has fallen off drastically, perhaps by as much as 70 per cent. Buses, cruise ships and hotels have been bombed, resulting in the deaths of seven tourists. The victims have been Europeans, Japanese and Americans. No one is immune.

In response to the escalating terror, the Egyptian government — which has ruled under emergency laws since the 1981 assassination of President Anwar al-Sadat — has adopted a two-pronged approach.

It has rounded up and arrested thousands of Muslim activists, hanging more than a score of them, and closed mosques, Islamic charity organizations and schools.

In addition, Mubarak has attempted to appease the forces of Islam by courting apparent Muslim moderates, a policy begun by Sadat. Before he himself was killed by fundamentalists, Sadat released hundreds of Muslim opponents from detention camps, funnelled scarce funds to Islamic institutions and made a public show of his piety.

With ominous results, Mubarak has maintained Sadat's policy. Thanks to the government's acquiescence, Al Azhar University in Cairo — Islam's oldest theological institute — has banned several of Naguib Mahfouz's novels as disrespectful to Islam; movie directors, entertainers, artists and writers have been forced to modify their work; and academics have had to tread carefully.

Under pressure from Islamic militants, Copts are hard-pressed to build new churches and repair old ones. Furthermore, a numerus clausus has been imposed on Christians, who've been gradually eliminated from positions as cabinet ministers, army and police officers, governors, bankers, parliamentarians and university professors.

In the face of this climate of fear and blatant discrimination, numerous Copts have emigrated. (In the past two decades, thousands have settled in Canada, bringing to an estimated 150,000 Canada's Coptic Christian colony.)

Many Egyptian intellectuals, proud of Egypt's secular traditions, believe Mubarak has gone too far in placating the forces of Islam.

Some of these critics have paid the ultimate price for their dissent.

Farag Foda, a well-known journalist who was particularly critical of the government's posture toward the Copt minority, was assassinated.

Others, like Shukri Ghali, charge that Egypt's minister of religious affairs, Mohammed Mahgoub, is in league with the fundamentalists and using his office to support the radical Islamization of Egyptian society.

Whether true or not, the fact of the matter is that the veil, rarely seen a decade ago, has made an enormous comeback of late.

Two organizations, the Islamic Group and Al Jihad (Holy War), are in the forefront of the Islamic insurrection convulsing Egypt today.

The spiritual leader of the Islamic Group is Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman, who faces charges in a conspiracy to blow up the World Trade Center in Manhattan. He has followers in villages, urban slums and universities.

Al Jihad, whose original acolytes murdered Sadat, is led by Ayman al-Zawahri, a physician who lives in exile in Switzerland, Iran and Afghanistan. Al-Zawahari fought with Afghan rebels against the Soviet army. His paramilitary outfit is said to be trying to infiltrate Egypt's armed forces.

Egyptian officials claim that both groups are supported by external powers. Last year, Mubarak reportedly told the director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency that Iran has set up training camps in Sudan for Islamic fundamentalists from around the Arab world trying to destabilize the Egyptian, Jordanian, Tunisian and Algerian governments.

There is no doubt that Iran — the fount of state Islamic militancy today — is helping Egyptian fundamentalists. But it is simplistic to assume that they are dependent on outside assistance and would wither away without it.

The truth of the matter is that Islamic fury is fueled by Egypt's crushing poverty — the joblessness and accompanying sense of hopelessness. The official unemployment rate of about nine per cent is actually far higher, especially among recent university graduates, where it reaches 40 to 50 per cent.

Popular discontent is also fed by woefully inadequate housing for an exploding population, and a widespread perception of a stagnant, corrupt and essentially one-party political system that ignores the aspirations of most of Egypt's 58 million citizens.

Critics charge that, in order to create jobs, encourage foreign investment and foster stability, Egypt must restructure its inefficient, centrally-planned economy. Under the guidance of the United States, the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, Egypt has made some progress in that direction. But, mindful of the 1977 bread riots which almost toppled Sadat's regime, Mubarak has resisted serious change.

Since the 1978 Camp David Accords with Israel, the United States has poured approximately $30 billion into Egypt, while conservative Arab regimes have written off billions of dollars worth of debts.

But, obviously, these transfusions have failed to stem the rising tide of Islamic militancy in Egypt.

Israel — which signed a peace treaty with Cairo in 1979, the first with an Arab nation — is worried by developments in Egypt, since Islamic leaders are deeply anti-Zionist and are aligned with the rejectionist camp in the Middle East. In keeping with their hardline philosophy, they reject Israel's Declaration of Principles with the PLO, bitterly describing it as a "blatant betrayal of the hopes of the Palestinian people."

More to the point, if the fundamentalists were to seize power, they would almost certainly renounce the peace treaty and sever diplomatic relations with Israel. This would doubtless trigger a major crisis in the Middle East, perhaps even emboldening Israel to recapture part of the Sinai Peninsula, with all its attendant consequences.

Likud's strength sapped by bitter infighting

By DAVID LANDAU

Citing eroding public support for the Palestinian self-rule accord, some political observers here think Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's coalition government could well unravel in the face of a host of political uncertainties.

But their assessment of the Likud opposition is no more generous.

"The Labor-Meretz government is just about ready to fall," wrote Emuna Elon, a popular, right-of-center columnist for the newspaper Ma'ariv. "But the tragedy is that there is no alternative to take its place."

She may have exaggerated the weakness of Rabin's coalition, but her evaluation of the state of affairs among the leadership of Likud seemed to hit the mark.

The Likud leaders, she wrote, "are stuck in the mire of their own egos."

"Some of them do have fighting spirit," Elon said, "But they direct it all at infighting between themselves."

Elon's criticisms of Likud came on the heels of a dramatic worsening of relations among the top echelon of the Likud.

Ariel Sharon triggered the latest downturn with a frontal attack on Benjamin Netanyahu, the Likud chairman known popularly as "Bibi."

Recently, Sharon made the clear-cut pronouncement — his first in recent years — that he wants to run for the Likud leadership and then for prime minister.

The hard-line former defence minister took aim at Netanyahu for his inability to arouse widespread support among the Likud rank and file against last September's sudden accord between Rabin and Palestine Liberation Organization chairman Yasser Arafat.

Sharon, who previously stood aloof from the race for leader of the Likud, has claimed that it is shortsighted and unfair of the party to have installed a neophyte like Netanyahu as its leader for the entire parliamentary term and into the next general election, which must be held by 1996.

Sharon said opposition to the self-rule accord — which in the eyes of the right wing spells mortal danger for Israel — requires bolder, more imaginative and more experienced leadership than Netanyahu, 44, is able to provide.

Many senior figures in the Likud Knesset faction are thought to be uncomfortable with Netanyahu's meteoric rise to the leadership.

They regard him as a political lightweight, a master of the television sound bite rather than a person of profound or single-minded political thinking.

In this context, these Likud critics note how Netanyahu originally announced he would honor the agreement with the PLO if he came to power.

But, they point out, he recently changed that stance, arguing that Arafat had violated the accord by failing to revoke portions of the Palestine National Covenant calling for the destruction of Israel.

The critics claim this zigzagging by Netanyahu reflected a shortsighted desire to curry favor with the factions of the far right, whose supporters, particularly those living in or linked to the settlements, are spearheading the public campaign against Rabin's policies.

Some observers think Sharon himself is angling for the support of these groups and would consider stepping outside the Likud to form a new party based on disgruntled Likud followers and other rightist groups.

Netanyahu, for his part, has referred to Sharon as "an inveterate underminer" — a phrase originally used by Rabin in 1978 to describe his longtime Labor Party rival, Shimon Peres.

In interviews, Netanyahu noted that Sharon had crossed swords with former Prime Ministers Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Shamir.

"Now it's my turn," Netanyahu added bitterly.

Shamir, who is sporadically active in public life, recently came to Netanyahu's side with the withering assertion that "Sharon will never be No. 1 in the Likud."

But Sharon's chances are regarded differently by another important figure on the right, Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan.

Eitan, whose staunchly nationalist party won eight Knesset seats in the surprise of the 1992 election, already cast his own hat into the prime ministerial ring, announcing he will run in 1996.

Recently, Eitan said Sharon was an eminently suitable candidate.

But he did not back down from pursuing his own candidacy, leading some pundits to predict that the two former generals — who together ran the controversial invasion of Lebanon in 1982 — may emerge from the current infighting on the right as a single ticket.

Open debate will foster greater involvement

By MILTON HARRIS

An open letter to Rabbi J. Benjamin Friedberg in response to his article in The CJN of Dec. 2, 1993 — "Diaspora has no right to decide future of Israel."

Dear Rabbi Friedberg:

Now I can understand why you have always refused to publicly criticize the policies of any government of Israel: you are afraid that your arguments will be so persuasive that the Israeli electorate — after all, they are the only ones who will "decide matters of life and death for Israel" — will be compelled to follow your lead. I doubt that you have anything to fear. Having participated in several Israel-Diaspora dialogues, I have never observed that Diaspora Jews make the slightest impression on the electoral preference of any Israeli.

Ordinarily, I would reply to you privately, but your attack on "peaceniks" — I confess to being one — requires a public response. You direct several accusations against us: we have pressured the Israeli government (are they moved by every word from Diaspora Jewry?); we have appealed to our own government "to lean heavily on Israel" (during the 30 years of lobbying governments for Jewish causes, I have never seen any Jew do that); we are only concerned with what our "Gentile neighbors would say" (is it useful to impugn each other's motives — why not stick to the issues?).

In the article, you touch on a crucial question: "What are the rights of Diaspora Jews, if any, in reacting to the new arrangements?" Since the establishment of the state, the nature of the Israel-Diaspora relationship has hardly been addressed. It is clear that Israel is not just a state in the Middle East with a majority of Jews: it is the Jewish State. In the perception of the rest of the world, and because of the bond I feel, somehow it also represents me.

Like Rabbi Marmur, I consider myself a Zionist but am unsure what that means today. Soon after forming the new state's first government, David Ben Gurion declared, "To be a Zionist is to move to Israel." That signalled the decline of Zionism as a force in Jewish life. But, I still cling stubbornly to the Ahad HaAm concept of Zionism: wherever we choose to live, we are one people based on the centrality of the Jewish State. Although I have no intention of making aliyah, and am a dedicated and involved Canadian, I still feel a strong bond with the Jewish state. I don't, however, vote in Israeli elections and therefore will never have the right, or the power, to "decide matters of life and death for Israel."

Nevertheless, I do cherish my right to express in public, at any time, my concern that the government of Israel, or our own Jewish community, is pursuing policies that are wrong for the Jewish people. I have no objection to your doing the same.

That for instance, was the reason I supported a resolution at the last Congress Plenary in 1992 that stated "The Shamir Government's settlement policy in the territories is an obstacle to peace," That resolution was soundly defeated. Can anyone today doubt that a doubling of the present settlers in the territories to 260,000 would have prevented any future Israeli government, no matter how strong its electoral mandate, from ever making a peace with the Palestinians that can only include territorial compromise?

Rabbi, you and I have been involved in the activities of our community. But we both know that a considerable number of Jews, especially our youth, are uninvolved with, and even estranged from the community. Some of this alienation — I don't say all — is their perception of Israel as an occupying power, and the Jewish establishment as monolithic, autocratic, aristocratic, and impervious to dissent.

Encouraging open discourse about Israel, I am convinced, would only strengthen Jewish support for Israel and bring greater involvement into our community.

Milton Harris is a past president of Canadian Jewish Congress and chair of CJC's War Criminals committee.

Grudging attitude

During his historic, precedent-shattering trip to Israel in 1977, Anwar al-Sadat of Egypt wisely spoke of the "psychological barriers" between Israel and the Arab world.

Sadat, the first Arab head of state to set foot on Israeli soil, was perceptive enough to grasp the essential truth that psychological factors are as relevant as substantive matters in the long, bitter Arab-Israeli conflict.

Realizing that, Sadat broke ranks with his fellow Arab leaders and offered Israel an olive branch. Speaking in the Knesset, he declared: "If you want to live with us in this part of the world, in sincerity I tell you that we welcome you among us with security and safety." At another juncture in his remarkable speech, he said: "I tell you, and I declare it to the whole world, that we accept to live with you in permanent peace based on justice."

These words, this vision, resonate 17 years later as Israel is bogged down in bilateral peace talks with the PLO, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon.The overarching lesson to be drawn from Sadat's courageous journey is that Israel is receptive to sincere overtures from the Arab side. In exchange for a peace treaty, which was signed in 1979, Israel, albeit reluctantly, relinquished the Sinai Peninsula to Egypt. Although the treaty has not fulfilled every expectation, Israel and Egypt are at peace.

Which brings us to Syria. In Geneva recently, Hafez al-Assad, the Syrian president, spoke of his desire to "normalize" relations with Israel and to seek "the peace of the brave." However, unlike Sadat, Assad did not truly offer the hand of friendship to Israel, nor, we should add, has he really prepared Syrian public opinion for this prospect. Instead, he spoke in vague generalities, without realizing that Israelis hunger to hear about the nuts and bolts of peace — diplomatic relations, open borders, trade.

And by refusing to admit all but one Israeli journalist (who held dual Swiss-Israeli nationality) to a press conference at the end of Assad's meeting with President Bill Clinton, the Syrians squandered an ideal opportunity to break down psychological barriers, and needlessly wrecked a chance at confidence-building.

Clearly, Syria can learn a lesson in diplomacy from the late, great Anwar al-Sadat. Syria, too, can learn from Jordan, which has already taken concrete steps to achieve peace with Israel. And Syria can learn even from the PLO, which is deeply engaged in the peace process.

If Assad fails to reassess his essentially grudging attitude to Israel, he will have to bear responsibility should the peace process not yield practical results.

Unintended results

One of the greatest achievements of the Zionists who created the State of Israel was to eradicate the malaria-carrying mosquitoes in the Hula marsh area of the northern Galilee.

Between 1951 and 1958, Israeli specialists in hydrology and agriculture supervised the drainage of that vast wetland area and managed to reclaim some 19,000 acres of rich submerged soil, which were used to produce potatoes, melons and cucumbers — important crops for the growing population of the newly emergent state.

However, it is now apparent that the high-minded exercise of draining the Hula swamps has had a deleterious effect on the subtle ecological balance in the area. According to the New York Times (December 5), the substratum of peat which formed the floor of the marshes decomposed through natural combustion over the years and penetrated the water table.

The result is that Lake Galilee itself has become polluted with the effluents from the Hula acreage, and the drained swamplands are now covered with mice-infested weeds.

Israeli engineers are putting the best construction they can on the problem, by saying that the draining of the marshes served Israel's purposes well in the 1950s; the realities of the 1990s, however, require that the Hula area be reflooded, in order to rectify the current situation. To this end, Israel will now create a lake covering 1,500 acres of the Hula area and will transform the site into a wetland wildlife park with boating facilities for tourists. Environmentalists hope that animals once indigenous to the area — water buffalo, deer, wild boar — will be reintroduced into the projected park.

Israel is to be commended for being realistic in dealing with a problem resulting from its own idealism. The Hula case, however, is an example of the unanticipated consequences that are often recognized years after initial decisions are taken. The mistake of draining the Hula valley appears to be rectifiable.

A final question remains with regard to the Hula wetlands project. Will the mosquitoes return with the water?

NEW ARRIVALS FROM YEMEN

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

REACTION TO LOBBYING

Your Israeli correspondent, Leora Frucht, accurately reports statements about lobbying made by me at a recent meeting in Tel Aviv (CJN, Jan. 6). However some context would, perhaps, be helpful to your readers.

I had been asked to react to Mr. Peyton Lyon's statement that the Jewish community is the most powerful lobby in determining Canadian foreign policy; wields disproportionate influence; and is more powerful than either the prime minister or the foreign affairs minister. I had not previously heard Mr. Lyon's statement and the outrageousness of this old canard obviously resulted in an element of dramatic overstatement in my own reaction.

Had I instead been asked to evaluate the strengths, weaknesses and overall effectiveness of efforts to influence Canadian foreign policy in the Middle East — and how this has varied over time and in specific instances — my response would almost certainly have been phrased differently.

Norman Spector
Ambassador of Canada to the State of Israel

Editor's Note: On Dec. 16, 1993 a letter to the editor from Peyton Lyon was printed in the Globe and Mail. In it Lyon claimed that Canadian Jewry's pro-Israel lobby, the Canada-Israel Committee, was "the most powerful lobby in the making of Canada's foreign policy"; and that its influence drew strength from the "exceptionally wealthy and cohesive" Canadian community.

NO HOLOCAUST DENIAL

It is not my intention to address most of Ralph Niessen's letter (Nov. 4/93), other than to say that not one anti-Polish charge is true or even vaguely accurate. I must, however, address his suggestion that I or any other Pole "is only steps away" from Holocaust denial.

A more absurd and crude statement could not be made.

Six million Polish citizens perished during World War II. This number represents roughly one in eight Polish Christians, and more than 90 per cent of Polish Jews. It is the most tragic epoch in the history of my country, and the brutality of the German occupation, which reached unprecedented depths of cruelty with its planned murder of Jews, is the most tragic epoch in world history.

For anyone even moderately familiar with Polish wartime history, Holocaust denial is an impossibility.

The fate of the Jews was recorded in Polish Underground documents, in statements by the Polish government-in-exile, and in countless writings since then. In Poland, memorials stand wherever a known atrocity was committed.

Some other facts bear mentioning. The Government Delegate (of the Underground) alerted London about the persecution of the Jews in 1940. The government-in-exile sent a note on this subject to Allied governments on May 3, 1941. Also in 1941, the Polish Ministry of Information in London published a booklet titled Bestiality Unknown in Any Previous Record of History. In January 1942, the ministry issued another publication, The New German Order in Poland.

Stefan Korbonski, the head of civil resistance in Poland, sent a great many messages to London, some of the most important being about the first armed resistance in the Warsaw Ghetto in January 1943; medical experimentation at Auschwitz in March 1943; reports on crematoria, massacres and ghetto liquidations; and on the identity of the Auschwitz commander (Hoess), and his chief aide (Grabner).

The Council for Aid to Jews, code named Zegota, was established on Dec. 4, 1942. A proclamation to the Polish population had been issued on Sept. 17, 1942 protesting against the unprecedented cruelty and mass murders by the Germans, and this proclamation was transmitted to the BBC and other Allied radio stations.

In 1942, the Polish underground emissary Jan Karski, who had, undercover, entered the Belzec camp, and then crossed Europe through Germany and France in order to bring eyewitness reports of Jewish liquidations to the Western Allies, met with and reported to leading politicians and journalists including Anthony Eden, Franklin Roosevelt, Felix Frankfurter and Walter Lippman. He communicated the plea from Jewish Resistance leaders for Allied bombing of rail lines and for Allied warnings to the German civilian population about the ultimate penalty for their government's atrocities. No action was taken. Lippman did not bother writing the story after interviewing Karski.

HELP THE LIVING

I was intrigued by your Dec. 23 praiseworthy editorial lauding Syria's President Hafez al-Assad's promise to assist the investigation of missing Israeli servicemen. For a man who has never been a lover of Zion, this is truly a remarkable concession. What motivated this dramatic change?

The demise of the USSR, Syria's closest ally, had a devastating effect upon her. She suffered colossal losses financially, materially and politically, which threatened the stability of the country, and may even have jeopardized Assad's survival as president. Faced with such peril, Assad chose to build bridges with the West, and particularly the United States. Under such circumstances helping locate Israeli graves was a minor concession.

In the meantime however, Hezbollah, which is fiercely opposed to the peace accord, has launched a campaign of terror, killing Israelis at random. They generally stage their attacks from territory controlled by the Syrian army.

According to Jewish tradition, it is a mitzvah to honor the dead, but an infinitely greater mitzvah to protect the living. Assad's gesture of helping locate Israel graves, rings hollow and insincere. He would gain greater credibility by taking the necessary action against Hezbollah, and thus save Israel lives, rather than offering to identify their graves.

German young men receive fitting sentences

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

As readers of this column know, it is my habit to keep a close watch on developments in Germany — its political and social climate, the condition of its Jewish community, and the nation's role in the world.

Recently I wrote about the disgraceful sentence that was meted out to the assailant of Monica Seles. Today, I can tell better news.

You will remember that in November 1992, an attack on foreigners took place in the small city called Moelln, in the northern state of Schleswig-Holstein. The arson resulted in the deaths of three Turkish-born residents, who were guest workers in Germany. It aroused worldwide attention and focused both on German xenophobic sentiments and on European anti-foreigner feelings in general.

The trial against the two young men,26-year-old Michael Peters and 20-year-old Lars Christiansen, was concluded last month and the sentences were handed down.

The following is a comment in the weekly publication The Week in Germany.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut

"The two young men held responsible received the maximum sentences possible. Peters was sentenced to life imprisonment for his conviction on three counts of murder, 39 counts of attempted murder, and one count of arson. Christiansen was found guilty of the same charges but, having been tried as a juvenile, received 10 year's imprisonment, the maximum allowed for a youthful offender.

"In announcing the court's decision, presiding judge Hermann Ehrich stressed that Peters and Christiansen had been aware of the possibly deadly consequences of their actions. The court was not persuaded that the two had displayed humanitarian insticts when they called the police and fire department's after setting the house ablaze in which three people died. On the contrary, the court found, Peters and Christiansen proved their extremist intentions in closing their anonymous calls to the authorities by saying 'Heil Hitler!'

"Defence lawyer Manfred Goerke announced before Wednesday's sentences that this clients planned to appeal their conviction. Goerke argued that their responsibility had not been conclusively proven."

The sentences were widely greeted with approval. Horst Kuehl, mayor of Moelln, expressed satisfaction that Peters and Christiansen had received stiff sentences and hoped that his city would no longer be a by-word for neo-Nazi terror. "We are a normal small city," he said. While one Turkish resident of Moelln told reporters, "Our trust in German justice has grown," another doubted that the conviction would do much to end anti-Turkish sentiment in Germany. In Ankara, the Turkish Foreign Ministry praised the sentence, as did the newspapers throughout Germany and Europe.

What struck me particularly amongst these comments was the one by the mayor of Moelln who said that, after all, his city was just a small normal place in which to live. But it was precisely in these "small normal" places, that so many of the atrocities of the Holocaust were perpetrated. The size of the city was not the deciding factor, compassion and cruelty could be found everywhere and anywhere.

The thought that in rural and small town areas there is a higher sense of morality no longer holds with the same force it once did. Television has levelled all of society, in all its locations. Unfortunately, it has not always been for the better.

Now that the shoe is on the other foot ...

By ROBERT K. LIFTON

Now that former prime minister Yitzhak Shamir and Likud Party leader Binyamin Netanyahu have finished their tours of American Jewish communities and returned home, it is worthwhile to consider the implications of their visits. A number of American Jews, particularly those who support the positions of the Rabin government, were deeply offended by the fact that both Shamir and Netanyahu chose to criticize publicly — both within and outside the American Jewish community, including in the halls of Congress — the actions and principles of the Rabin administration regarding the peace process.

Many reminded the Likud representatives that when their party was in power they angrily condemned anyone from the opposition in Israel who challenged their actions in the United States. Such arguments, they then claimed, should be limited to Israeli soil: "We should not wash our linen in foreign lands."

Now that the shoe is on the other foot, however, they are not only willing but eager to criticize their opponents. They try to differentiate the present situation by arguing that these issues are existential — too important to the future of Israel to require abiding by the old rules.

I do not contest the right of Likud spokesmen to advocate their position in the United States. Yes, of course, they are being hypocritical. But that goes to the issue of character, not their right to speak their minds.

Indeed,it was valuable for Americans to hear the positions of Shamir and Netanyahu because it was so clear that neither of them offered any sensible and acceptable alternative to the course now being pursued by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to make peace with the Palestinians and the Arab world. They railed against the Declaration of Principles and against any arrangement with Syria that might entail returning all or part of the Golan Heights. Yet they never explained how the Likud would solve the problem of trying to retain control over 1.8 million Palestinians demanding some form of self government and still retain Israel's democratic and Jewish nature.

Nor did they explain how a comprehensive peace between Israel and its neighbors can be achieved without a deal with Syria that involves territorial compromises respecting the Golan. Anyone listening carefully to their arguments had to conclude that their course would send Israel back to being a pariah state, losing all the hard-won gains of the present process in achieving unprecedented acceptance among the nations of the world. For these reasons I am glad that they aired their views in the United States.

There is one position in particular that was articulated direcly by Shamir and, by implication, by Netanyahu that deserve special condemnation. Shamir stated explicitly that were the Likud to return to power, it would "abrogate" the Declaration of Principles entered into by the present government. This idea is that later governments of Israel are not bound by the ability of any Israeli government to commit the nation to binding agreements. It may well do more damage to Israel's relationships in the family of nations than any Arab attempt to delegitimize Israel.

Can one imagine the hue and cry that would have ensued had President Hosni Mubarak, when he came into office, disawoved the Camp David agreements reached by Anwar al-Sadat with Menachem Begin?

While Netanyahu at one time openly expressed the same position as Shamir, he now packages it more slickly. He states that the Likud would indeed adhere to the present agreement with the PLO but would insist on an interpretation that results in maintaining pockets of Palestinians in separate enclaves or cantons. Of course, this interpretation fully negates the intent and objectives of the Declaration of Principles.

Likud leaders like to argue that there is no point in making deals with Israel's Arab neighbors; since they are not democracies, they cannot be relied on to honor their agreements. What would these positions say about Israel as a democracy?

A small miracle at the Western Wall

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

When we think of miracles, we generally think big: the Red Sea parts, the sun stops overhead, the flood ends, the people survive again. We rarely encounter small miracles, and if we do, we are wary of identifying them. It takes considerable chutzpah to claim that one was sent a miracle, even a teeny tiny miracle. So, I will simply tell you a story, and you can decide for yourself exactly what happened.

We were spending our honeymoon in Jerusalem, a city where miracles are probably likelier than anywhere else, but even there, miracles are not part of one's personal daily expectations.

It was July 1979. My husband, raised Reform, and myself, raised Conservative, were studying Orthodox Judaism in a very religious neighborhood of Jerusalem. We were living about a twenty-minute bus ride away, in a summer rental apartment in the Jewish quarter of the old city. Our apartment was on a courtyard at the end of a series of winding paths that started near the Kotel, The Western Wall.

We went back and forth to school by bus. The bus stop nearest our apartment was the end of the route, the gate adjacent to the Wall. Each day, I got off the bus, walked right past the Wall, and climbed up the set of stairs to a path that led to our courtyard.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

One day, after classes, I was heading home alone because my husband had an additional class. I thought I would get back in time to make a nice dinner, so I purchased up some groceries: a few onions, a few tomatoes, a chicken, and a handful of other things; the shopkeeper put them in a brown paper bag.

Then, I got on the bus.

When the bus arrived at my stop, I stood up to leave and my groceries crashed to the floor around me. The juice of the chicken had leaked, destroying the brown paper bag. If I had been at any other bus stop on the planet, I would have simply bundled my groceries into my skirt, hiked it up pouch-like, and made do. But I was at the Wall. I could not walk past the Wall with my skirt pulled up way over my knees. I wasn't Orthodox, not yet, but this was the Wall and I didn't have to be a Torah scholar to understand that proper dress was required. I had already come far enough to know that.

On the other hand, I could not carry all these slippery, wet things in my arms. I could not imagine what to do, except take the chicken and abandon the veggies.

I crawled around the floor of the bus gathering my goods. Then I said, half-aloud, half to myself, in real truth more swearing than praying, "G-d, I wish I had a shopping bag."

At that moment, I looked under the seat in front of mine, right where I had just reclaimed an onion from the empty floor, and there was a beige plastic shopping bag with a brown mesh pattern and a rope handle.

It was just big enough to hold everything.

I filled it up and took it home.

Of course, there are many logical explanations for this: someone else had left it, it had been there all along, it had slid forward — or back — from under some other seat. Sure it did. Maybe it just materialized. Maybe it didn't. I don't know. I do know that there are many things beyond my understanding, and this apparently minor event may well be one of them.

When you are given a shopping bag — or any item, no matter how mundane — by a possibly mystical event you cannot explain, you try to hang on to it. But when I looked for that shopping bag just a day later, it was gone. I ransacked the apartment. I looked for it from that moment until we packed up weeks later and came back to the States, but I never found it.

I don't know where it came from, and I don't know where it went.

Future dim in Borisov

Sheldon Kirshner visits a small Jewish community in Belarus.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Seventy kilometres northeast of Minsk, past dense pine and birch forests, ramshackle villages, neat farms and manicured cabbage fields, lies the unremarkable town of Borisov.

Despite its population of 150,000, Borisov is really not much more than an overgrown village, and a dreary one at that.

Certain images reinforce this impression — the compact, single-storey wooden homes framed by trees and enclosed by gardens; the muddy lanes reminiscent of a shtetl; the sight of old men and women, bundled in several layers of clothes, tending to piles of smouldering autumn leaves giving off acrid smoke.

To a Western visitor, Borisov appears caught in something of a time warp. Elsewhere in the former Soviet Union, statues of Josef Stalin — a politically incorrect figure since his death — have long disappeared. But here, a visitor is surprised to see a statue of what appears to be a benevolent Stalin in a defiant pose.

Borisov's industrial pride and joy is its match factory, with its huge smokestack and its row upon row of dusty windows. It's the beating heart of Borisov's economy, employing 2,000 workers. It was the largest such facility in the former Soviet Union, an essential plant in a nation of dedicated, almost obsessive cigarette smokers.

Inside, down a dim hallway, is the unadorned office of Aleksandr Rosenblum, 68. Rosenblum, a phlegmatic lawyer, looks after the factory's legal affairs. He is also vice-president of Borisov's Jewish Cultural Society, known otherwise as Light of Menorah.

Borisov is home to approximately 1,000 Jews. Before the Holocaust, Jews comprised upwards of half its total population. The future does not look bright. "I think most Jews will leave," said Rosenblum, whose son and daughter have made aliyah. "They see no light at the end of the tunnel. They don't believe they, or their children, have a good future here."

No less than 1,000 Jews have packed up and left in the past decade, according to Rosenblum. Their chief destinations have been Israel, the United States and Australia. A handful have gone to Canada.

It's not difficult to understand the flight. Belarus has fallen on hard times since it seceded from the Soviet Union in 1991 and embarked on the rocky road to a free market economy. It's struggling to transform itself into a prosperous capitalist society, but affluence is still far off. In the interval, the people cope with the ravages of hyperinflation, the threat of massive unemployment and the fallout from the 1986 Chernobyl disaster, which has stricken some of Borisov's citizens with cancer. Chernobyl is about 600 kilometres from Borisov, but winds have carried radioactive particles to many regions of Belarus.

In spite of everything, Rosenblum has no immediate plans to emigrate. He is, however, keeping his options open. Some day soon, he and his wife may join their children in Israel. His daughter, a computer programmer, lives in the West Bank settlement of Ariel. She emigrated in 1990. His son, an engineer, settled in Ashdod. He has been there for the past five years.

If Jews continue to leave, the future of Borisov's organized Jewish community will be placed in doubt. But emigration seems to be the trend, and Elizabeth Belyavina is an example of this phenomenon.

Belyavina, 41 and single, is the director of Borisov's Sunday Jewish school, which was established in December 1991 with 15 pupils and now has 40.

In April, she and her mother intend to emigrate to New York City at the invitation of relatives. "More than half my friends have already left," said Belyavina, a Russian teacher by training.

Belyavina will leave behind a community that has been battered by communism and nazism.

During the communist period, the authorities in Borisov shut down Jewish schools and institutions, closed all 13 synagogues and converted them into social clubs and warehouses. One lone shteibel, frequented by religious Jews, was tolerated.

"It was dangerous to show an interest in Jewish life," recalled Rosenblum.

On the eve of the German invasion of the Soviet Union, more than one-third of Borisov's inhabitants were Jewish. Jews settled in Borisov in the 17th century or earlier, lured by the grain and lumber trade.

The German army marched into Borisov in the summer of 1941, bombing the town in advance of its occupation. In the chaos, Rosenblum was separated from his parents. He and his cousin escaped, fleeing eastward toward Soviet lines. For a while, he was a railway worker. Then, in 1944, he was conscripted by the Red Army.

By Rosenblum's count, 9,000 Jews were killed in Borisov by the Nazis. They were confined to a ghetto, and murdered in October 1941.

His parents were luckier. Having also escaped, his father served in the Red Army, and his mother worked on a collective farm. After the war, the family was miraculously reunited, and Rosenblum studied law in Minsk, the capital of Belarus.

He and his wife, a journalist, joined the Communist party. "It was the thing to do," he observed. "I was a son of the times."

But Rosenblum was also a true believer, and his faith in communism was not diminished by Stalin's anti-Jewish policy, launched in the late 1940s. True, Rosenblum flinched, and he feared for his life. But not even Stalin's anti-cosmopolitan campaign, climaxed by the Doctors' Plot, shook his beliefs.

Rosenblum remained faithful to the party almost to the end, even though he, and later his daughter, were the victims of state anti-Semitism.

"There were times," he said without elaborating, "when I was denied work."

When he finally quit the party in August 1990, he was thoroughly disillusioned with communism.

Having abandoned communism, Rosenblum found a haven in the Jewish community, whose cultural revival has been of a modest nature.

In 1990, Rosenblum was a founder of Light of Menorah, which was officially registered a year later. To this day, it's still the only Jewish organization in Borisov, though efforts are now underway to form a Jewish religious society.

There is no shul, and the community has not reclaimed old synagogue buildings that were somehow spared by the Nazis. Sabbath and High Holiday services are conducted in a rented building — without either a rabbi and, since 1992, a minyan.

An American rabbi did visit Borisov in the autumn of 1991, ostensibly to say kaddish on the 50th anniversary of the the ghetto's destruction.

The Holocaust is commemorated here in two ways.

After perestroika, a simple plaque was affixed on the wall of an orphanage which saved seven Jewish children.

Around the same time, an obelisk was erected in a thickly-wooded ravine, off a road, where thousands of Jews were taken to be shot in cold blood by the Germans and their local collaborators.

Typically, the Soviet-style inscription deleted all references to Jews. Last October, a menorah was added to make amends.

Steps lead from the obelisk down to a black plaque in a clearing of a dark pine forest. The inscription, in Russian, reads: "9,000. Why?"

This haunting question will always remain unanswered — not only in Borisov, but in every locale in Eastern Europe which was darkened by the malevolent spirit of the Holocaust.

The Jewish World

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Raisa Petrovna has had enough.

She wants out.

Petrovna, 48, is an example of a Jew in the former Soviet Union whose thoughts have turned to emigration.

A resident of Minsk, the capital of Belarus, she was a "typical" Soviet Jew under communism, more or less integrated and yet not fully assimilated because anti-Semitism kept getting in the way.

Born in Bobruisk, a Jewish centre before the Holocaust, Petrovna is an English teacher. Her husband, 53, is an engineer. They have two children, a son of 21 and a daughter of 16.

The catastrophic state of the Belarussian economy is the main reason for their current interest in emigration.

As the most industrialized republic in the old Soviet Union, Belarus was relatively prosperous. But times have changed. In its transition from communism to capitalism, Belarus is struggling with a host of unwieldy problems. Most notably, its new currency is weak, non-convertible and subject to hyperinflation. This affects everyone but those fortunate few who earn hard currency — dollars, marks, pounds or whatever.

A reasonably good monthly income today is equal to about $100 (US). The Petrovnas don't fall into that blessed category. Their combined take-home pay does not exceed $70.

Under these circumstances, the Petrovnas can only survive on a subsistence level. "Practically all our money goes for food," she said. "We can't afford new clothes, or a holiday."

And it is becoming harder day by day. Now, at the markets, vendors demand payment in dollars. No one has faith in the local currency. There is a climate of despair. "From an economic point of view, it was better under communism," she said, echoing an oft-heard refrain in this part of the world.

With the economy in ruins, the field is open to demagogues who may yet pander to the lowest common denominator. Anti-Semitism is already on the rise, Petrovna claimed. "The government shows a good face to the Jewish community, but I fear an explosion. The Belarussians hate us, though some of my best friends are Belarussians."

Anti-Semitism is nothing new to the Petrovnas. Fifteen years ago, she was in line for a promotion at her school. She had the support of her principal. But the job did not come through. It was, as far as she is concerned, a clear-cut case of anti-Semitism.

Woes in Belarus

Petrovna's husband has suffered a similar fate. "He hasn't advanced at work because he's Jewish," she said.

Until recently, he didn't want to leave Belarus. He was attached to Belarus and, besides, he was a communist. But now he is ready to pack his bags.

"I believe we can have a better life somewhere abroad," she mused. "I am prepared to wash floors, if only for the sake of my children."

They hope to settle in the United States. Her husband's sister lives there and can sponsor them. They have considered Israel, but ruled it out.

"I visited Israel last summer, but I didn't exactly feel at home there," she said. Israel was too Middle Eastern. "The Sephardi faces were strange to me."

Like a good many of the 120,000 Jews in Belarus, Petrovna was estranged from her Jewish origins. Decades of Communist party repression saw to that.

Three years ago, shortly before Belarus broke away from the Soviet Union and declared independence, Petrovna went through a transforming experience.

She was asked to be an interpreter for Israeli youth leaders in a B'nai Akiva summer camp near Minsk. "This opened up my eyes to Jewish culture. I had been ignorant of Jewish customs and traditions. But now, baruch hashem, I know something."

Since then, Petrovna has immersed herself in the Hebrew language, drawn closer to the organized Jewish community, and taught Israeli folk dancing at Minsk's Sunday Jewish school.

But in all probability, her days in Belarus are numbered.

America beckons.

Toronto youth leader elected to top International USY post

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Tamara Kochberg

TORONTO — Reserved? Uninvolved? That image is hard to reconcile with the energetic, talkative former competitive swimmer and 1991 Ontario Winter Games gold medal winner. Not only does Tamara Kochberg hold two United Synagogue Youth (USY) vice-presidencies, she also tutors Hebrew, teaches bar/bat mitzvah lessons, lifeguards and serves on the prom committee at Vaughan Secondary School — all while maintaining an A average.

"USY changed my life. I was quite reserved. I didn't like to get involved in extracurricular stuff," said Kochberg in a recent interview. A founding member of Shaar Shalom's USY group, she is vice-president of Eastern Canadian Region USY (ECRUSY) and was recently elected executive vice-president — second in command — for International USY at its late December convention in Irvine, Calif. She served previously on International USY's general board as Israel Affairs co-chair.

Aaron Levinoff, of USY at Adath Israel Congregation, was the other Canadian elected to the international executive. He is membership-Kadimah vice-president.

Kochberg's involvement with the Conservative movement's youth group began seven years ago when she was an 11-year-old United Synagogue Day School student. As a founding member of Shaar Shalom's USY chapter, she saw the group initially as an excuse to get together with friends. Although USY caters to post-bar and bat mitzvah students throughout their high school years, Kochberg was able to join early because the then fledgling Shaar Shalom chapter was not yet officially part of USY.

Shaar Shalom's USY chapter is one of 11 chapters belonging to ECRUSY, which encompasses Toronto, London, Hamilton, St. Catharines and Ottawa. ECRUSY is one of 17 regions making up the organization in Canada and the United States. There are also sister chapters in Israel (called NOAM, for Noar Masorti, or Conservative Youth) and in Hungary (NOAM-USY).

Attending programs and "getting involved" led to Kochberg's discovery of the regional level, which offered a variety of conventions and a leadership training institute that she attended in 1992 and 1993. "I've learned organization, and an endless amount of leadership [skills]," she says. She credits her perseverance to her experience as a member of the Markham Synchronized Swimming Club, as part of which she competed for four years on a provincial level.

As ECRUSY vice-president, Kochberg spends a lot of time on administrative work, she said. One of her duties involves helping individual chapters plan programs. If a chapter wants to plan a program with an Israeli theme, for instance, she will "help them brainstorm."

She attributes the level of her involvement to the 1992 USY Pilgrimage - Poland Seminar in which she took part. The trip included 10 days in Poland, followed by five weeks in Israel. "It was a fantastic educational experience," says Kochberg.

The students visited five concentration camps as well as the castle formerly inhabited by Polish monarchy. "We learned to deal with our feelings. It was an intense look into what we studied. It was an excellently organized trip," said Kochberg, adding that the religious Conservative component of the trip made it unique. Thrice-daily minyans and Shabbat observance were built into the program. As a result of her participation in USY, Kochberg has deepened her observance of kashrut and Shabbat.

On the program, she forged friendships with people from other regions, reuniting with them at USY's annual international convention, which she attended as ECRUSY representative.

In her new position, Kochberg will oversee Israel-related programming, edit a trimonthly newsletter, and act as liaison between USY and the America-Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC).

Having experienced both the dangers and the beauty of Israel, Kochberg says it is her "duty to continue to share that experience and to encourage and help USYers to travel to Israel, to learn about our Jewish homeland and to help in its development and growth."

Levinoff gets USY posting

TORONTO — Aaron Levinoff, 17, of United Synagogue Youth (USY) at Adath Israel Congregation, was one of two Canadians recently elected to USY's international executive. As membership-Kadimah vice-president, he is one of five vice-presidents dealing with specific areas of USY's operations. (Tamara Kochberg, executive vice-president, is the other Canadian.)

Aaron Levinoff

A Grade 12 student at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Levinoff is one of 28 volunteer peer counsellors at his school. In addition to visiting Grade 9 classes to advise them about choosing subjects, Levinoff is available to help other students, either in person or by phone. The position requires 70 hours of training, Levinoff told The CJN. He feels he has benefitted personally by learning improved communication skills.

Levinoff also tutors Grade 4 English and Hebrew, as well as coaching his 12-year-old brother's hockey team.

Levinoff's international position involves trying to increase USY membership throughout North America, he said. He is in contact with the North American regions through a monthly newsletter.

International USY is shifting focus to become more involved in political issues such as environmental problems, Levinoff noted. "We don't get involved in right wing or left wing, but we do get involved in issues of the day."

After four years in USY, Levinoff particularly values his USY friendships, as well as the leadership, organizational and listening skills he honed at USY leadership training institutes.

As a high school student, he finds USY a welcome break from the "competitive environment" at school. "Basically, it's fun," he says. "I want to be involved in what's happening, and I can make a positive contribution."

Emigre convicted in Kleinberg case

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Russian emigre who moved to Canada from Israel has been convicted of manslaughter in connection with the death of Toronto jeweler Michael Kleinberg.

Kleinberg, proprietor of the family store, Samuel Kleinberg Jewellers, at Lawrence and Bathurst Street, was killed during a July 9, 1991 robbery in which $3.45 million in gems and rings was taken. The 35-year-old jeweller was bound and gagged by ropes tied around his neck that asphyxiated him.

According to Crown prosecutors Michael Blain and Paul Tait, Russian-born Alexander Yaari, 34, came to Canada on Jan. 29, 1991 and was married to a Toronto woman a month later. Yaari's immigration papers described him as a boxing coach in Russia and a sailor in Israel.

At the time of his arrest, Toronto police told The CJN that according to Moscow authorities, Yaari, who was known in Russia as Alex Podlesny, was not Jewish.

Evidence presented during the trial also indicated that Yaari told associates he had served two 3½-year sentences in Russia for rape and assaults and also had a conviction for theft.

Testimony during the trial showed that Yaari left Canada three days after the robbery. While in Vienna, Yaari severely beat an associate after they had a falling out over a failed business scheme. The associate's friend tipped off police to Yaari's presence, eventually leading to his arrest in an early morning raid by an elite unit of Austrian police employing SWAT tactics and stun grenades.

Police found 33 rings worth $79,000 on Yaari. The rings were eventually traced back to the Toronto robbery. They are all that remains of the $3.45 million in valuables that was stolen.

Yaari's Vienna associate eventually turned police informant and testified that Yaari told him he carried a sawed-off shotgun to the store during the robbery. He also testified that he saw Yaari produce a handful of diamonds from a secret pocket in a pair of pants.

Originally facing charges of murder, Yaari waived the right to an extradition hearing when the murder charge was reduced to manslaughter.

During the trial, Crown prosecutors submitted their theory that Yaari had at least two accomplices in the heist. They noted noted that there were no signs of forced entry at the jewelry store, suggesting Yaari had some inside help.

A jury deliberated for eight hours before finding Yaari guilty of manslaughter and robbery. He will be sentenced on March 7 by Ontario Court judge Eugene Ewaschuk.

Winnipeg religion writer takes Judaism to heart

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — As Rabbi Alan Green of Winnipeg's Beth Israel Synagogue notes, rarely do you find people who convert to Judaism out of conviction and a search for truth.

Glen MacKenzie is one of those rarities.

Originally from Toronto, MacKenzie grew up in Los Angeles. He returned to Toronto in the early 1970s and enrolled in Ryerson's journalism program. In 1975, he began working as a reporter for the Winnipeg Free Press.

Three years ago, MacKenzie was moved to the paper's religion page, a move that coincided with the paper's decision to give religious issues more coverage.

Like many baby boomers, MacKenzie notes, he was raised in a secular household. Religion was reserved for weddings and funerals.

"As a religion reporter, I would often hear from clerics that professing a belief in a Supreme Being didn't mean much when you never attend any services," he says. "There was also the question of coming to terms with my own mortality and the social-community aspects of religion and belonging to a group."

MacKenzie says he was attracted to Judaism in part because he liked the specifics — the dietary laws, honoring the Shabbat and the religious symbols of the home, like the Chanukah menorah.

Being Jewish in Canada, he says, gives him a distinct identity he felt he lacked prior to his conversion.

MacKenzie's interest in Judaism was acutally piqued two years ago when he became friendly with Rabbi Judah Kogen, then at the Rosh Pina Synagogue, at a Passover seder held at a church in Kenora for the church's congregation and Kenora's small Jewish community.

"I found Rabbi Kogen to be very interesting and intellectual," MacKenzie says. "My wife (who is supportive of MacKenzie's conversion but not interested in religion herself) and I invited the Kogens over for dinner. They invited us for Sukkot, a Chanukah party and a seder."

He made his decision to convert early last year while holidaying in Jamaica. He read the Torah. On returning to Winnipeg, he enrolled in Rosh Pina's conversion class.

"I have had no trouble giving up pork and I have learned to live without shrimp or clam chowder soup," he says. "The biggest problem has been not being able to drink milk with meat. As well, Hebrew is a tough language to learn. I am still struggling with it in the synagogue."

MacKenzie finished conversion classes in September. On Jan. 13, he appeared before a Beth Din comprised of Rabbis Green and Henry Balser of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue and the Shaarey Zedek's chazan, Sandy Cohen.

On Jan. 18, he underwent his ritual circumcision. At the end of January, MacKenzie is leaving for a working holiday in Israel where he hopes to immerse himself in a mikvah and complete the process.

So far, he reports, all the reaction to his conversion has been positive from the Jewish and non-Jewish communities. Even Christian clerics have been supportive.

MacKenzie has also become involved in the Jewish community as a board member of the YMHA Jewish Community Centre and a member of the Folklorama committee for Shalom Square, one of North America's largest ethnic festivals. As well, he has joined the Beth Israel Synagogue, where he says he's found a friendly, welcoming atmosphere.

The Beth Israel's Rabbi Green would like to see more converts attracted to Judaism. "There is no reason that Judaism should not be actively participating in the free market of competing ideologies."

Yeshiva U's Israel Club chooses Canadian student as president

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

NEW YORK — Tamar Schneider, better known as Tami, is the second consecutive Canadian president of Yeshiva University's (YU) Israel Club.

A third-year education student at Stern College, Schneider succeeded Jasmine Conen, a friend from her days at Ulpanat Orot, Toronto's Bnei Akiva high school for girls.

Schneider, 21, who is in her second year as president, said in a recent telephone interview that she wants to emphasize that the Israel Club is not political.

In addition to providing student programs, the club acts as a conduit for information about Israel and Israel-related activities. New York's Israeli consulate and the American Zionist Youth Federation are among the organizations which keep club members informed.

Unlike law or education clubs, the Israel Club doesn't target a specific subgroup within the university population, Schneider noted. "Everyone has some connection with Israel," she said.

Tami Schneider

A Yom Ha'atzmaut program last year attracted 600 people. Membership in the club is several hundred, according to Schneider. A recent Shabbaton attracted a record 150-plus people, she said.

Last year Schneider worked on New York's Israel Day parade, in which 75,000 people took part and Israel Club members carried a YU banner.

The club's theme for the parade was the international aspect of YU, which has students from places like Iran and Costa Rica, said Schneider.

"There are a lot of Canadians involved with the Israel Club," she mentioned. Schneider herself is a dual citizen. She moved to Canada from the United States with her family as a small child.

Schneider has been to Israel and hopes to study there again, she said. A former counsellor at Camp Moshava, she served as junior congregation co-ordinator at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, where her father, Rabbi Barry Schneider, is associate rabbi. As an education student, she is following in the footsteps of her mother, Barbara, a teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools.

Security concerns said essential for Israel

By AMY SATTIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israel shouldn't lose sight of its security concerns in pursuing an agreement with the Palestinians, says one political scientist.

Prof. Alexander Bligh of Jerusalem's Hebrew University said he supports the peace process begun last September in Washington, D.C., but cautioned against making concessions that would affect personal and national safety in Israel.

"The preoccupation of all Israelis is security," said Bligh last month, in a lecture sponsored by the continuing education committee of Beth Emeth-Bais Yehuda Synagogue and the Institute for International Affairs of B'nai Brith Canada.

The lecture was the first in a three-part series titled Assessing Israel's Peace Dividends at the Beth Emeth synagogue. About 30 people attended.

Bligh, a visiting professor at York University and a reserve major in the Israel Defence Force (IDF), made numerous comparisons between the peace negotiations with Egypt in the late 1970s and current negotiations with the Palestinians. He said food riots in Egypt in January 1977 were the impetus for the late Eygptian president Anwar al-Sadat to begin bargaining with the Israelis 10 months later, while a bankrupt PLO came to the table in September 1993, after being cut off from Saudi Arabian financing.

Bligh said one difference in the current negotiations is the lack of Palestinian understanding of Israeli security concerns. He said events like the Holocaust and Masada have left many Israelis feeling alone in this world, a feeling that Sadat seemed to understand but that Palestinian negotiators do not.

In assessing these concerns, Bligh set out five points he wants to see considered during the Israeli-Palestinian talks:

- Israeli control of the bridges between Palestinian territory and Israel proper to prevent smuggling of explosives, small armaments and "anything that would harm our security;"
- Exclusion from the Palestinian police force of "convicted murderers [or others] with Israeli blood on their hands;"
- Ensuring that the Palestinian police force never be allowed to become an army;
- Guaranteed protection of Israel's main transportation arteries; otherwise "every airplane taking off and landing at Ben Gurion Airport would be within range of Palestinian mortar shells; every car entering and leaving Jerusalem would be in range of Palestinian small armaments; and cars on the highway from Haifa to Tel Aviv would be in range of Palestinian artillery;"
- Finally, what Bligh called "the principle of hot pursuit," which would allow Israeli forces to chase terrorists back to their home base.

Bligh was in Israel in December and told the audience that while the peace process "cannot and should not be stopped," opinion polls showed only 50 per cent of Israelis support the processs. He said national unity was too important to sacrifice.

"Peace with the enemy should not mean war within our people. If it means two Jewish peoples living in Israel, no way. Forget the Palestinians, forget the Arabs, forget everybody. It's a price no Israeli should or can pay."

Bligh also raised the possibility that some IDF soldiers may disobey orders to evacute settlers from the territories, a concern voiced by an IDF officer he met during his December visit.

NIF puts emphasis on social needs

By ELIZABETH SUMMERFIELD
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In Israel's early years Jewish donors gave money to help build homes, bridges and roads. While roads and bridges are still needed, the president of the New Israel Fund (NIF) says that he feels more comfortable addressing the social needs of the country.

"There is something much more fulfilling when you are helping to build a society that you can be proud of," said Maurice Green at a recent lecture sponsored by the United Jewish People's Order at the Winchevsky Centre in North York.

Green is a labor law specialist and has been president of the NIF since 1992.

The NIF was founded in 1979 in the United States by Eleanor Freedman and Jonathan Cohen. "Part of the reason they felt they wanted to form the New Israel Fund was because — in what was pretty much a socialist-oriented state — they were concerned that the State did everything," said Green.

"The last thing on the agenda for so many years was in fact the state of the society. The Jewish agency would look after things — the Kibbutz movement, whichever one you were in, would look after things — the bureaucracy would look after things — don't question, don't push. And as a result, there were very few grassroots social action groups."

In Canada over the past year, the NIF had over 900 donors. Money raised by the NIF goes towards such areas as civil and human rights, the status of women, Jewish-Arab coexistence, religious pluralism and tolerance, and assisting new immigrants in Israel.

The NIF is a partnership between Israelis and Diaspora Jews. "It's not the Diaspora imposing its version of what Israel should be doing. We're there to help," said Green.

Among the groups supported by the NIF is the Israel's Women's Network, which has shelters for battered women and rape crisis centres across Israel. As well, Green mentioned the Movement for Governmental Reform, which is "a grassroots organization of people coming together, saying look at the dilemma that Israel has been in all these years. We know the political classes, we know the power the religious groups hold — we have to have a change." The Environmental Defence Force which works toward a better water supply in Israel, among other projects, is another group supported by the NIF.

When asked by an audience member whether people can donate money to the NIF and specify which cause they wish to support, Green said that it is possible to give an "area designated donation." However, he added, people are encouraged to give to the general fund.

Historic site chosen for WJCC complex

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's Campus complex is one step closer to fruition. At a press conference held at the Manitoba Legislature on Thursday, Jan. 20, Jim Ernst, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, announced the sale of the Fort Osborne Barracks to Winnipeg Jewish Community Campus (WJCC) Inc. for $2.2 million.

Campus is envisioned as a combination K-12 school and Jewish community centre, which will replace Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in north Winnipeg, Ramah School in south Winnipeg and the present Y downtown. Sheldon Berney, president of WJCC Inc., noted that the three buildings are "outdated and poorly located."

"We are delighted to purchase such an historic site for our educational, social and cultural facility," he said.

The barracks sit on 16 acres of land in an area between Tuxedo and River Heights in south Winnipeg, where about 50 per cent of the Jewish population live.

Several of the buildings currently on the site are listed as historically significant by the Manitoba Historical Resources Act and have to be incorporated into the Campus complex. The buildings formed the original University of Manitoba Faculty of Agriculture around the turn of the century. From 1917 to 1967, the buildings were used by the Canadian Armed Forces. At the moment, they house various provincial government offices which will be relocated.

Berney reported that the estimated cost to build Campus is $20 million. "I am happy to say are we close to our goal," he said. "Support from corporations, foundations and the community have been terrific. Thousands of people have given of their time and money."

He said the construction process will create 450 jobs and make a significant contribution to the local economy.

The construction plans still have to pass an environmental assessment and receive the appropriate heritage and zoning permits. Berney said that, optimistically, the WJCC Inc. is hoping to begin the 1996-97 school year at the new Campus which will also house a library and community offices.

Tu b'Shevat telethon successful in Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Take many more callers, give them double the number of phones, and what do you get? A very successful telethon!

Follow-up calls still have to be made and the final tally isn't in yet, but judging by results so far, Hamilton Jewish National Fund (JNF) Tu b'Shevat telethon co-chairs Maureen Price, Sharon Marcovitz Hart and Ronit Gafni have every reason to be pleased.

Indeed, with "a lot more people to help clean up" the campaign, Price is sure that "we're going to do better still, better than in previous years."

It was largely thanks to the efforts of former Na'amat president, Marcovitz Hart, who happens to be the current Hamilton JNF president, Price said, that the women's organization was able to enlist the help of 26 JNF board members and friends in addition to their own 30 volunteers.

The additional office space was provided by Effort Trust Company, which shares the building with the accounting firm of Taylor, Leibow, where the telethon has been held in recent years.

This was the sixth annual JNF Tu b'Shevat telethon conducted by Na'amat, which is raising funds for its third project.

The first was for a site in Eilat, the second for Mount Scopus; this year's project, said Price, is an orchard garden in a Jerusalem Peace Forest recreation area.

The garden "will be terraced as in ancient times" and planted with "fig trees, olive trees, vines and grapevines."

"Somehow that just caught our imagination," she added.

An interesting sidelight, Price noted, is the fact that this happens to be a shmitta (fallow) year, when no in-ground planting is permitted.

However, rabbinical authorities permit the planting of nursery trees "on specially prepared, plastic covered surfaces," in other words, she explained, "so long as nothing is planted in the ground."

In-ground planting is permitted, she added, in cases where peoples' livelihood is at risk, especially that of new immigrants and the unemployed.

But in general, JNF emphasis this year "is on healthy forest maintenance."

Na'amat expected it would take them two years to complete their new project, but the way things are going, said Price, "we may even finish it this year."

The Certificate of Participation and Other Good Deeds

Every year, high school and college students by the hundreds are presented with a hand-lettered Certificate of Participation for completing an educational day—including a tour—at Benjamin's. Their comments positively affirm our belief in the importance of teaching this area of Jewish life. We also speak continuously to community groups, and lecture in schools on the religious, psychological and social context of our work.

Education, professional leadership and Tzedaka affirm Benjamin's role as a community resource. These are natural extensions of our everyday activities, fulfilling needs for Jewish dialogue, supporting innovations that better serve families, and providing support at the personal and professional level.

We are proud that today's students who come to learn about the mitzvot performed from the moment we are called, are the fifth generation to benefit from Benjamin's dedication to community service.

Jewish ethics viewed as useful in medicine

By MARA KOVEN
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — Dr. Mark Poznansky does not claim to be a halachic expert on Jewish ethics. But his experience and interest have led him to understand that secular and Jewish medical ethics often differ.

Poznansky is president and scientific director of The John P. Robarts Research Institute, an autonomous medical research organization affiliated with both the University of Western Ontario and University Hospital. Poznansky spoke to 80 Hadassah-WIZO members at their Annual Medical Services Luncheon Jan. 16.

"When I give this talk to non-Jews, they are sometimes jealous," said Poznansky. There is a lack of guiding rules or policies surrounding secular medical ethics, he said, but Jewish medical ethics "follows not only a set of laws but laws set down in a hierarchal manner . . . the issues of life and its sanctity, the supremacy of God . . . take primacy over all issues . . ."

Poznansky demonstrated the difference between medical ethics and Jewish ethics by presenting several cases:

As a physician you have a patient with AIDS. The patient's partner is also your patient. The person with AIDS asks you not to divulge this information to the partner. What do you do?

"Jewish medical ethics will state unequivocally that you must tell the patient's partner. The value of life is infinitely more sacred than the doctor/patient trust." Poznansky said secular medical ethics is still stuck on the issue of doctor/patient confidentiality.

A young chemistry student drops and breaks a bottle of dangerous gas on the lab floor. He falls to the floor unconscious but is revived and later discharged fom a hospital. He later dies at home from congestive heart failure as a result of a delayed reaction to the gas. This information is not represented in the medical literature and is therefore not taught to medical students; the emergency room physicians could not have predicted this outcome. But, Poznansky continued, "the Nazis experimented extensively with this gas in concentration camps during the Holocaust. The experiments were heinous in nature and completely unethical." Should the data from these experiments be available?

Poznansky presented this dilemma at the second International Conference on Jewish Medical Ethics in San Francisco several years ago. "The rabbis' interpretation from Jewish law is once again clear. You can and must use any data or information available to save a life. Certainly the sanctity of a life is much more important than the issue of the ethics of the Nazi experiment."

According to Halachah, there are only three things you can't do in order to save a life: take a life, perform idolatry or adultery.

Poznansky also pointed out that halachic interpretation can change, as in the definition of death. Secular ethics have endorsed the Harvard criterion which states that death has occurred when there is cessation of all brain waves (as determined by an EEG) and the opinion of at least two disinterested neurologists. Survival off life support must not be a possibility.

Optimal transplant conditions

Jewish law previously considered death to be the cessation of the heart beat, breathing and a detectable drop in body temperature. Unfortunately, these are not optimal conditions for organ transplant.

Halachic expert Rav Moshe Feinstein argued for halachic acceptance of the Harvard definition of death in the mid-1980s. After "exhaustive sessions of she'lot-teshuvot (questions and answers) posed by the Orthodox medical community, it was decided to accept the Harvard criterion by the majority of Orthodox Jewry for the purposes of organ transplantation," said Poznansky.

Prior to accepting the Harvard definition, he noted, halachic experts considered transplants double murder: removing the donor from life support systems and the small chance of survival for the recipient. The increased survival rate for transplants was an important consideration in changing the Jewish law.

Poznansky also spoke about human testing of drugs. Jewish law says testing is prohibited without consent or some benefit to the patient. For example, clinical trials of AZT for people with AIDS was condoned because the patients may have benefited. But even with informed consent, sometimes it is not enough reason to permit possible hazardous procedures, Poznansky said. This belief has frustrated researchers.

These limitations stem from the "laws pertaining to . . . the notion of our being created in God's image and the prohibition against doing self harm," Poznansky said.

CZF contest competitors getting ready for finals

TORONTO — "We are pleased to invite the public to attend the finals of our third annual Public Speaking Competition, which promises to be the most exciting and competitive final to date," said Shalom Schachter, vice-president, Education, of the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF), central region. "The finalists will be competing for a trip to Israel as well as other attractive prizes. All the competitors have been outstanding and have displayed both eloquence and an in-depth knowledge of Israel affairs," he continued.

The event will take place on Feb. 6, 1994, at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, 470 Glencairn Ave., at 8 p.m.

Possible topics to be chosen include: A "new zionism" was born with the mutual recognition between Israel and the P.L.O.; The end of the cold war has opened up a Pandora's box of anti-Semitism and racism; and Jewish continuity will flourish with the increasing recognition of the role of women.

Judges will be Michael Shneer, businessman and a member of the C.Z.F. (central region) executive; Shoel Silver a member of the district administrative board, B'nai Brith Canada; and Paul Marcus, national director of the Institute for International Affairs, B'nai Brith Canada. The moderator will be lawyer Shalom Schachter, who has acted as chair for this competition.

The program consists of a 20-minute speech by each contestant, a brief question and answer period and a discussion among the contestants on a topic chosen by the judges.

Finalists will be competing for a trip to Israel, a $250 State of Israel Bond and $100 cash.

TORONTO CRYOBIOLOGY CENTRE INC.
